Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

Pedestrians (Casualties)

1. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research has been undertaken in the last two years into measures to reduce pedestrian casualties.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): A lot. This is one of our highest priorities.

Mr. Hughes: I thank my hon. Friend for that full answer to my question. When looking at pedestrian casualties, has my hon. Friend taken into account the important part that can be played in preventing casualties by using speed humps to slow down vehicles? Does he agree that it is almost impossible for a local authority to institute speed humps, because the road either has too much or too little traffic and never seems to be quite right?

Mr. Bottomley: I may arrange to have more detailed information placed in the Official Report. This year we are spending £1·5 million as part of a £5 million pedestrian-related safety programme.

We are on our second or third set of regulations relating to speed humps. I should be delighted to relax the regulations again. They have been made tight in the past to avoid their being rubbished because of one accident, but they can prevent many. I hope that we will find ways of reducing or eliminating the cost of drainage, which accounts for two thirds of the cost of road humps. More road humps could then come in. I will pay special attention to the degree of traffic.

Mr. Allen: The Minister will be aware that the North report on road traffic law has been published, and he will have a copy. When will that report be brought before the House in the form of legislation, especially to avoid pedestrians being killed by reckless driving or—under the North recommendations—the new offence of "bad" driving?

Mr. Bottomley: The House will know that my right hon. Friend has promised a preliminary report before the end of this Session—the rest will follow on. I look forward to the time when heavy goods vehicles will stop intimidating and crashing into cars; cars will stop crashing into motor cycles; motor cyclists will leave cyclists alone; cyclists will leave pedestrians alone; and pedestrians will not get so drunk and kill so many of themselves. We all need to recognise the importance of co-operation on our roads.

Mr. Simon Coombs: Does my hon. Friend recognise that the answer to pedestrian safety lies in education? What discussions have he and his departmental colleagues had with the Department of Education and Science about pedestrian safety tuition being included in the core curriculum for all schoolchildren?

Mr. Bottomley: It is not so much a question of incorporating that into the core curriculum, as of trying to go from one school out of five knowing what it is doing about road safety training to five out of five. The Department of Transport, the Department of Education and Science and local education authorities have a responsibility to ensure that any parent, teacher or governor can work through a checklist so that more can be done to provide safety for the children in their school.

Traffic (Central London)

2. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to reduce the density of private motor traffic within central London.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Paul Channon): I aim to promote measures to help the existing traffic to flow more freely. The measures that we are taking are improving trunk roads to take traffic round, rather than through, London; promoting the use of new technology to improve traffic management; encouraging more effective parking controls; and working with British Rail and London Regional Transport to improve the quality of the rail and Underground systems.

Mrs. Michie: Does the Minister have a view on the report in the press today that four private consultant firms consider that London should have a network of new toll roads? Would it not be much better for the public to use public transport? How will he encourage them to use it much more?

Mr. Channon: On the first part of the hon. Lady's question, that is an extremely unlikely idea. She is referring to a progress report by consultants who have been working on the project for two years and have another year to go. None of the suggestions has had the blessing of the Government. They are merely progress reports to be considered by the relevant people.

It is absolutely essential to increase investment in public transport. I am determined that we should have a better commuter service into London and a better Underground service. That will be done by providing, as we have, large measures of investment in those services.

Mr. Squire: In view of the congestion in the Westminster area, will my right hon. Friend confirm that his Department is looking at proposals to build a tunnel under the Thames to take through traffic well away from Westminster?

Mr. Channon: Westminster city council and the Government have commissioned a consultants' report to examine that matter. We await the report.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Secretary of State take this opportunity to tell the House and the public at large that the report in The Guardian today is accurate, that he condemns the plans to demolish 5,000 homes in London and introduce toll roads in London, that he will call a halt to all major road building in London, and that instead he will put far more resources into public transport and diverting traffic around London? Is he aware that when the GLC was controlled by Labour the use of public transport increased significantly and that road traffic in London was reduced because London's transport policy was directed towards the needs of the people of London rather than towards the minority of car commuters and heavy goods vehicles traversing London?

Mr. Channon: I assure the hon. Gentleman that the use of public transport is increasing a great deal faster now than it was when the GLC was in existence. Investment in the Underground is 60 per cent. higher in real terms than it was under the GLC, which starved the Underground of investment.

Mr. Tony Banks: Oh, come on.

Mr. Channon: Well, I shall give the figures to the House. Today, investment is running at £365 million a year. That is 60 per cent. higher in real terms than when the GLC had control of the Underground. As for the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I have already made it clear that these are progress reports of studies that were announced two years ago. The sensational story in The Guardian today merely repeats an answer that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Transport gave to the House on 27 June and information that was placed in the Library over two weeks ago.

Mr. Cormack: But is not the time coming when my right hon. Friend will have to consider radical remedies, such as charging people extra for driving regularly into London and restricting deliveries by goods vehicles to the hours of darkness?

Mr. Channon: I should be very reluctant to charge people for travelling into London by road. It would allow only those who could afford it to come into London by car. It would be very difficult and bureaucratic to operate and would lead to many unfairnesses. My hon. Friend may be right. One day somebody may have to do that, but it is a deeply unattractive option which I am not at all keen to pursue.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Will the Secretary of State, in what might be described as a moment of glasnostian candour, admit that his Department does not have a clue what about to do about getting cars off the roads of London? His response to his hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) illustrates that fact. Does the Secretary of State admit that on the Kensington-Fulham border, where four years ago the Government refused to allow the GLC to invest £25 million to improve the rail system, the Government are now talking about an investment of £150 million to build two miles of road, which would mean pulling down houses and bringing further traffic on to an already too dense traffic system?

Mr. Channon: I cannot understand why the hon. Gentleman should show this sudden interest in Kensington. So far as I know, he has never before asked a question about Kensington and I suspect that he will never again. I repeat that we have no new proposals for changing the road system in Kensington.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Why is not more use made of the River Thames and other waterways in London, which would take traffic off the roads? Will my right hon. Friend take a trip to Venice and see the effectiveness of the water buses there and introduce them on the Thames?

Mr. Channon: I cannot imagine anything nicer than a trip to Venice. My hon. Friend is on to a good point. In the past we have neglected the Thames far too much. I hope that commercial services will start very shortly. Such a service already exists between, more or less, this House and docklands. I hope that it will be extended to Chelsea. It will play a useful part in carrying a proportion of the traffic that wants to come into the centre of London.

Roads

3. Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he proposes to take in the light of the Audit Commission report on local authority maintained roads; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: The main action is for local authorities. I have already urged them to implement the commission's recommendations for spending up to their provision on maintenance, and for improving the efficiency of their arrangements. I repeated this message at a meeting with them only last week.

Mr. Blunkett: The Secretary of State will be aware that the Association of Metropolitan Authorities has welcomed the bulk of the Audit Commission's report, but obviously some matters still cause it concern. Over the 10 years to 1986 traffic on urban roads increased by more than 20 per cent., but spending fell by 10 per cent. Deregulation has put more traffic on the roads, and revenue support for public transport fell from £512 million to £249 million between 1982 and 1987. As a consequence, and as has already been said this afternoon, there is a major crisis in road maintenance and traffic management. Does the Secretary of State have any positive proposals rather than encouraging local authorities to spend more and then penalising them when they do so?

Mr. Channon: I am not doing the latter, as the hon. Member knows. I have provided local authorities with nearly £150 million for 1988-89 above their estimated expenditure. If only local authorities will get on and spend that money, local roads will be considerably improved. That is the action I am urging them to take.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I am sure that my right hon. Friend agrees that people living in our larger cities, such as Nottingham, hold their district council responsible, when it is the county council that holds the purse strings. Will he re-examine that aspect and either insist that counties spend their full allocation, or make the money available to districts, so that they can deliver what the public demand of them?

Mr. Channon: I shall consider my hon. Friend's suggestion, although I suspect that it might turn out to be mildly controversial. The important point is that the relevant authorities have had the money and they must spend it, or our local urban roads will deteriorate, and then the cure will be very much more expensive.

British Rail

4. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the chairman of British Rail; and what matters were discussed.

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State last met the chairman of British Rail on 24 May. They discussed a variety of railway matters.

Mr. Hughes: In view of the announcement that is expected this week about new investment schemes for the Channel tunnel project, can the Minister give a preliminary indication that British Rail will be allowed to invest in Wales, Scotland and the north of England, and that there will not be just another bonanza for south-east England? Will the Minister bear in mind that the port of Calais is a relatively deprived area, but stands to gain considerably from the Channel tunnel project?

Mr. Mitchell: British Rail expects to publish its study on Thursday. The hon. Gentleman will know that British Rail is planning to invest about £3,800 million over the next five years. Moreover, whatever area of the country may be the subject of viable British Rail proposals for investment, I shall consider them sympathetically.

Mr. Gale: My hon. Friend has been instrumental in securing improved road transport facilities for north-east Kent. When he last met the chairman of British Rail, did he impress upon him the need for a rail service to replace the rather mediocre one from which we suffer at present, which, in these days of high-speed trains, transports passengers at an average speed of 40 mph?

Mr. Mitchell: As to Kent passenger services, part of the reason for the study being published on Thursday is to ensure that British Rail can cope with Channel Tunnel traffic without damaging commuter services.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: Does the Minister agree that it is vital that investment in the so-called regions of the United Kingdom be increased? Is he aware of the high demand for increased electrification of the east coast line north of Edinburgh, and of continuing demand for a rail crossing at Dornoch Firth? Both are of vital importance if we are not to be disadvantaged when the Channel tunnel comes on stream.

Mr. Mitchell: Investment in British Rail is designed to meet the volume of passenger or freight demand. In the further regions of Scotland the passenger volume is a great deal less than it is in some other parts, but wherever British Rail has a viable business project to bring forward for investment purposes we shall look at it very carefully.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: When my hon. Friend saw the British Railways Board, did he stress that when the board brings forward proposals for privatisation it will not be thought acceptable for British Rail merely to be transferred to a private monopoly? What Conservative Members want is competition.

Mr. Mitchell: These are very early days in our plans for the longer-term future of British Rail, with privatisation as an option, but I shall of course keep my hon. Friend's point in mind.

Mr. Snape: When the Minister next meets the chairman of the board, Sir Robert Reid, will he impress on him the need for proper facilities for both passenger and freight traffic arising from the Channel tunnel development? Those facilities are necessary across the provinces and regions, and particularly in the west midlands.

Will the Minister also insist that on-train customs and immigration facilities should be provided on cross-Channel trains, in the same way as they are in the rest of Europe? Will he ignore the reactionary views of the Home Office, which predictably wants more bureaucrats than passengers on the trains?

Mr. Mitchell: I shall of course ensure that the hon. Gentleman's comments about proper facilities for Channel traffic are conveyed to the chairman. Substantial consultation is taking place about the services, particularly freight services, that should be provided from north of London and throughout the country to maximise the benefits from the Channel tunnel.

When I next meet the chairman, I think that I should tell him that we are very pleased to learn from his recent report that he is getting there—and getting there much faster than we expected. After all, 1987-88 was an outstanding year, with the highest operating surplus in British Rail's history. Passenger volumes were the highest for 27 years, and passenger earnings were the highest in real terms since nationalisation.

Road Crossings

6. Mr. Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the Government's policy on providing equestrian, cycling or pedestrian bridges across, or tunnels under, major roads, and what criteria are laid down for such projects.

Mr. Channon: We consider suggestions and proposals on their merits.

Mr. Chapman: Will my right hon. Friend look sympathetically at the need for a combined equestrian, pedestrian and cyclists' crossing on the section of the A1 between South Mimms and Stirling corner, not only because it is effectively of motorway standard, but because of the volume and velocity of the traffic on the road? For example, 800 horses are stabled in that corridor of that part of north London.

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend has raised this difficult matter assiduously on behalf of his constituents. As he says, the A1 is a very large road with a great deal of traffic, which makes it very difficult to cure the problem of horses crossing it. What my hon. Friend suggests would cost a good deal and I shall have to consider it carefully, but it is an important point and I shall certainly look into it.

Crowlas Bypass

7. Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received seeking a bypass for Crowlas on the A30.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Penwith district council, the A30 Action Group, the Crowlas A30 Action Group, Ludgvan parish council and the Ludgvan conservation society have supported my hon. Friend in pressing for the inclusion in the national roads programme of a bypass for Crowlas.

Mr. Harris: My hon. Friend will know from letters that he has received from the bodies that he has listed of the strong and entirely justifiable feeling of residents of those communities, whose lives are made a misery by the amount of traffic on the existing road that masquerades as the A30. Will he give an undertaking that the long-awaited bypass will be included in the programme to be announced, presumably, next spring?

Mr. Bottomley: Without prejudging decisions to be made then, I can say that it will certainly be considered.

Mr. Tredinnick: Although I am sympathetic to the problems of the A30, is my hon. Friend aware of the difficulties facing my constituents because junction 1 on the M69 goes only in a northerly direction? Will he consider pressing his Department to answer the requests made three years ago for an inquiry into why that is, and take express measures to get the southern link built?

Mr. Bottomley: The Department will consider what my hon. Friend has said.

Wheel Clamping

8. Dr. Michael Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what guidelines and advice he has given recently on wheel clamping and the circumstances in which it should be used; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Requests for wheel clamping areas may be made by local highway authorities to my right hon. Friend. We issued a guidance note on selection criteria in May 1987. Responsibility for operational matters rests with the police.

Dr. Clark: Does my right hon. Friend agree that wheel clamping should be reserved primarily for deterring motorists from parking in no-parking areas, and that clamping motor cars parked in residential areas without permits or at parking meters after the clock has run out is an inappropriate use of clamps which should have low priority?

Mr. Bottomley: Most people will agree that what is important is that when a car should not be parked in a certain place an effective deterrent is needed—clamping is certainly that. The other matters are rather more operational and I shall make sure that they are considered in the appropriate places.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: May we have an inquiry into how a back-street garage in Brighton managed to secure the contract for removing vehicles from the streets of Brighton?

Mr. Bottomley: I do not have a clue.

Mr. Higgins: While, in general, wheel clamps seem to waste an enormous amount of police time and slow down traffic even more than would have happened if the vehicles were not clamped, will my hon. Friend consider putting massive wheel clamps on coaches on Westminster bridge which discharge their passengers into the centre of the road and are likely sooner or later to cause a serious accident?

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bottomley: The House notes my right hon. Friend's persistence in this matter. It would be appropriate if the Department encouraged the relevant authorities to get together to try to solve the problem before there is a serious accident.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is the Minister aware that the low level of enforceability of parking restrictions in London is a matter of massive concern to hon. Members and Londoners generally? What does he think about the proposal that local authorities should take over responsibility for the traffic warden system? If we could decriminalise parking in London, the fines that could be levied by the local authority run traffic warden system could go direct to paying for the cost of the system, in which case we could perhaps get somewhere with enforcing parking restrictions in London.

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman is good at encouraging us to suck eggs. The important part of this question and the answers to it is that the privatisation of wheel clamping and towing away has led to a higher degree of deterrence, which is to be welcomed. I know that the hon. Gentleman is against the privatisation or contracting out of anything——

Mr. Tony Banks: Why does the Minister not answer the question? He is so stupid and smug.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Driving Instructors

9. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what further measures are being taken to improve the quality of driving instructors.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Targeting and extension of check testing; widening the syllabus and introducing a banding system in the written examination; and limiting failures in the practical tests.

Mr. Brown: Does my hon. Friend agree that although those actions will go a long way towards increasing the quality and standard of driving instructors, it might also be a good idea to publish league tables showing how successful individual driving instructors and schools are?

Mr. Bottomley: It is certainly true that for a market to work effectively one needs not only competition but information. The point my hon. Friend makes is being considered and discussed with the associations of driving instructors. There are problems, especially those of identifying a candidate with a particular instructor, but we shall report to the House when we have come to a conclusion on these matters.

Inner Cities

13. Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action his Department is taking to aid the regeneration of inner city areas.

Mr. Channon: We have under construction or in our plans, road schemes worth £2 billion to assist inner city areas. Transport supplementary grant is assisting local roads costing £600 million in these areas. The London Docklands light railway has shown how innovative public transport can help to attract private sector development.

Mr. Sayeed: In welcoming my right hon. Friend's excellent answer, may I ask whether he would care to amplify it by saying what contribution he is encouraging from private finance to increase the transport systems in inner city areas?

Mr. Channon: We are working very closely with the private sector to try to bring enterprise back to inner city areas. The best known example is Canary wharf, where the developers are jointly funding the Docklands light railway extension. Another example is the Meadowhall development in the Don valley, to which my Department will contribute 30 per cent. of the cost of the access roads. I am sure that there is scope for further extending this process.

Mr. Rees: Who will have responsibility in the UDC areas that the Government have set up for the planning of roads?

Mr. Channon: Local highway authorities will have that responsibility.

Public Transport (London)

14. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he expects to announce a major initiative to improve public transport in London.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced a study into the overcrowding problems on British Rail and London Underground services in central London in March this year. It is too early to say what proposals may emerge from it.

Mr. Marshall: May my hon. Friend tell the House when he expects this study to be concluded? May we have an assurance that a major factor in the study will be the proposals that have been put forward to improve the capacity on the Northern line, which has been described by the chairman of London Regional Transport as "an abomination"?

Mr. Mitchell: We expect the central London rail study to report shortly to Ministers. We shall have to consider it before we can come to any conclusions on it. Investment for improvements to the London Underground is running at the rate of £1 million a day, and that is nearly 60 per cent. higher in real terms than in 1984-85.

Mr. Home Robertson: Will the Minister take this opportunity to say something about the shameful chaos at London's airports? Why are the Government failing to carry out the investment programme that is required to bring air traffic control in the south of England up to the standard that ought to be required?

Mr. Mitchell: That is a somewhat different question, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the problem lies, not in the airports, but in congestion in the air space.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Can my hon. Friend confirm the report in Private Eye that London Buses Ltd. is thinking again about the introduction of one-person operated buses in central London?

Mr. Mitchell: London Buses Ltd. identifies appropriate services for the introduction of one-man operation. It is not the intention of London Buses Ltd. to operate such buses throughout the system. It is a question of considering the matter route by route and forming a judgment about the best method for each route.

Ferry Crews

15. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps are taken to ensure that existing procedures avoid any risk of double counting by his inspectors of crew numbers on ferries.

Mr. Channon: Some 118 inspections of cross-Channel ferries carried out in the last six months have revealed no evidence of double counting of crew.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Will the Secretary of State confirm that all inspections of the ferries are done by prior arrangement with the ferry operator? Would he care to comment on what steps his Department took to examine the allegation that appeared recently in the press to the effect that crew members were being shifted from ferry to ferry in order to make up the crewing complements?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. The inspections are not all done by prior arrangement. I have checked carefully and repeat that some are not done by prior arrangement. My marine surveyors have found no evidence to support the allegation in the hon. Gentleman's supplementary question.

Mr. David Shaw: Will my right hon. Friend confirm not only that the Government have implemented many of the proposals of the Sheen inquiry about ferry safety, but that all the people who work on our ferries are now working on ferries that are far safer than they have ever been in the history of Britain's ferry transport?

Mr. Channon: We have carefully implemented a great many of the recommendations of the Sheen report. We may have to consider more. I confirm what my hon. Friend says about the immense amount of work that has been done and the immense amount of work being caried out by my surveyors to make sure that ferries are sailing safely.

Mr. Skinner: In the past few months there have been several major accidents and lack of safety has been central to almost every one of them. Those accidents were at Zebrugge, King's Cross and now in the North sea. In the light of that, would it not make sense for the Government, instead of taking the side of Jeffrey Sterling and P and O, to institute a proper inquiry into all the complaints about lack of proper inspection on the ferries? Would it not make sense to get on with the job and carry out an impartial investigation instead of siding with the management?

Mr. Channon: I do no such thing, as the hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well. I treat his remarks with contempt. We investigate carefully any allegations that are made, from whatever source they come.

Coach Safety

17. Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the outcome of his discussions in June with the Bus and Coach Council on improvements in coach safety.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The outcome of the discussion was that the Bus and Coach Council agreed to make progress on the safety of power doors and the need to fit seat belts.

Mr. Cran: Does my hon. Friend agree that, as his Department's figures show that bus passengers are three times more likely to be injured than, for example, rail passengers, the cost of £1,000 to £1,500 to give seat belts to all passengers in a 57-seater bus is cheap at the price?

Mr. Bottomley: It is worth remembering that we need to go step by step. The House passed the Motor Vehicles (Wearing of Rear Seat Belts By Children) Bill 1988. We are requiring seat belts in the exposed front seats of coaches, but is has not yet been made mandatory. I prefer to see coach operators fit seat belts voluntarily and then see whether passengers are willing to use them. I agree with my hon. Friend that we need to continue to try to improve safety in all forms of transport, but travelling by coach is substantially safer than travelling by car. Perhaps we should turn our attention to car safety, even more than to coach safety.

Sir Anthony Grant: Is my hon. Friend aware that one of the greatest contributions that could be made to safety in coaches would be to stop them going too fast in the wrong lane on motorways, too close behind other vehicles? Is he aware that, in Japan, heavy goods vehicles are fitted with lights which show when they are exceeding the speed limit and that it is perfectly possible to have a system which shows when they are too close behind another vehicle? When will he do something along that line?

Mr. Bottomley: Very shortly. Legal speed limiters on coaches are coming in, and that is greatly welcomed. The excessive speeds of coaches have been reduced dramatically. Speeding by HGVs and by cars has come down, although not speeding by motor cycles. We should pay attention to my hon. Friend's point about automatic visibility signs on speeding vehicles. In Singapore, for example, light vehicles flash a yellow light when they are going too fast and the police just wave them in.

Minibus Services

18. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of services in England outside London are now operated by minibuses.

Mr. David Mitchell: Information is not available in the form requested. Deregulation has encouraged operators to introduce minibuses on their services and they now represent about 10 to15 per cent. of all PSVs used on local services. Passengers in over 400 areas are benefiting from this flexible form of transport.

Mr. Pike: With respect, does that answer not show that the Minister does not really know what has happened as a result of the Transport Act 1985? Should the Government not do more to survey the congestion that arises in some areas, as well as boasting about the improvements achieved? Many people have suffered a deterioration of service. Why does the Minister not analyse the situation and give a full report to the House?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman will be interested to know that the latest research shows an increase from 400 minibuses operating in 40 places throughout the country before deregulation to no fewer than 5,600 in over 400 places. The big advantage of the minibus is that it reaches those parts that bigger buses cannot reach.

Mr. Hind: Is my hon. Friend aware that I, like the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike), come from Lancashire and that, in the rural parts of Lancashire that I represent, there are more minibuses than ever before, which are reaching far more customers in those areas and are greatly appreciated by the communities there?

Mr. Mitchell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for calling attention to one of the most phenomenally successful aspects of deregulation.

Waste Imports

20. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the impact on the trunk roads network in Merseyside of increased heavy vehicle movements consequent upon the importation of American waste for dumping in Warrington.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: None.

Mr. Butler: Will my hon. Friend now proceed to such an assessment, given that 600 22-tonne lorry movements will be involved every day from Liverpool to Warrington for five years, bringing in 7½ million tonnes of rubbish to my constituency? Does he not think that that is an unacceptable strain on the road network in the area?

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend would be on stronger ground if he were to refer the House, as I will, to the clear statement made by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment on 30 June. I imagine that some cases involve a Department of Transport interest, but it is worth noting that those issues are mainly the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, with some important aspects for my right hon. Friends the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Road Bridges

21. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many motorway and trunk road bridges are currently in need of repair.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Between 5 and 10 per cent. of the department's 8,500 or so bridges need structural maintenance each year.

Mr. Clarke: Does the Minister accept that that is quite a high figure and that those of us who use the motorways and the north-west trunk road bridges realise that, apart from avoiding accidents, there are opportunities to provide jobs in the construction industry?

Mr. Bottomley: We can no longer say that the country has a major problem with jobs in the construction industry. Some of us consider that in some parts of the country the position is slightly the reverse. Programmes of maintenance have kept pace with the need for general repairs, and the special needs of older bridges in particular are being tackled under a 15-year strengthening and upgrading programme.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Birmingham Pub Bombings

61. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Attorney-General when he last met the Director of Public Prosecutions to discuss the investigation by City of London police into telephone calls made by Dr. Frank Skuse during his appearance as a witness at the Old Bailey in the case of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings.

The Attorney-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): On Friday 8 July 1988.

Mr. Mullin: Has Sergeant Paton been asked when he was last in touch with Dr. Skuse, and if so, what was his reply? If the Attorney-General cannot answer that question now, will he undertake to supply an answer later?

The Attorney-General: I will undertake to remind the hon. Gentleman of the course that the inquiry has taken. On 17 March he made the assertion that Dr. Skuse had been in touch with the former Detective Sergeant Paton in the course of his evidence at the Court of Appeal hearing. My hon. Friend the Minister of State advised the hon. Gentleman to place any evidence he might have of any possible irregularity before the police. It was not until 3 June, in response to a request made on 9 May from the Commissioner of the City of London police for the source of the information, that the hon. Gentleman identified the source of his information. That turned out to be somebody who, in turn, had it from somebody else, and he has refused to identify that person. Therefore, the inquiries have come to an end.

Mr. Marlow: What is the value to IRA fund raisers in America of the campaign by subversives and muddle-headed Opposition Members to undermine the credibility of British justice? What is the cost in United Kingdom lives?

The Attorney-General: On 20 June, when I last answered questions on these matters, I said that I deprecated as being very harmful, determined attempts, as they are seen to be, to undermine confidence in the administration of justice. I reiterate that opinion today in response to my hon. Friend.

62. Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Attorney-General when he last met the Director of Public Prosecutions to discuss the further police inquiry into telephone calls made by Dr. Frank Skuse during the Birmingham pub bombings appeal.

The Attorney-General: I refer the hon. Lady to the answer that I have just given to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin).

Mrs. Clwyd: Is the Attorney-General aware that during the previous police inquiry carried out by the Devon and Cornwall police, Sergeant Paton changed his statement to make it fit in with Dr. Skuse's version of events? Has he been asked why he did that?

The Attorney-General: I recall that the Court of Appeal, in its judgment delivered in February, had this to say about the scientific evidence to which much of the inquiry and the fresh evidence had related. I shall cite what was said by the Court of Appeal:

"We repeat the question which we posed for ourselves before considering the impact of the fresh evidence and answer it without any hesitation as follows: nothing has emerged from this mass of material which causes us to doubt that the scientific evidence proves that one or more of these appellants had been in recent contact with explosives."

The conclusion of the judgment states:

"As has happened before in References by the Home Secretary to this Court under Section 17 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968, the longer the hearing has gone on, the more convinced the court has become that the verdict of the jury was correct.

We have no doubt that these convictions were both safe and satisfactory."

As to whether any witness at the main trial or at the hearing before the Court of Appeal gave conflicting evidence in any regard, each of those matters was considered in a hearing before the Court of Appeal, which lasted longer than any similar hearing. That is the measure of the confidence that the country should have in the outcome.

Mr. Baldry: Is not the fact of this case that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary exercised his powers to refer the case to the Court of Appeal? Having heard all the evidence that the men's legal representatives wanted to put before the Court of Appeal, the court decided that the convictions were safe and that there was no reason to interfere with them. Having regard to the length of time that the Court of Appeal took in hearing the case, is it not now time to say, once and for all, that there is absolutely no reason why those convictions should in any way be questioned or interfered with?

The Attorney-General: It is very important to remind ourselves that every opportunity was given to those who take the view of the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), that there was something unsafe in the original convictions, to call fresh evidence and review the previous evidence before the Court of Appeal. I have read, because I thought that it would be helpful to do so, the opinion of the Court of Appeal on that fresh evidence. Accordingly, to keep on and on seeking to undermine the reliability of the conclusion of the Court of Appeal without further evidence is very harmful to public confidence.

"Spycatcher"

63. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the implications for his general policy on initiating litigation of the costs of legal actions relating to the book "Spycatcher".

The Attorney-General: To enforce the duty of confidentiality owed to the Crown I shall, on behalf of Ministers collectively, continue to take such steps by way of civil proceedings as appear to the Government to be appropriate.

Mr. Cryer: Does the Attorney-General accept that where there is a serious criminal seditious conspiracy, it is a civil servant's duty to expose that conspiracy, and that an attempt to bring down the 1974 Labour Government is set out in Peter Wright's book "Spycatcher"? Is it not shocking that the Attorney-General should spend in excess of £1 million trying to suppress that book, which no Government officer has tried to contradict, when those people in MI5—Tory supporters—who tried to organise the downfall of the democratically elected Government of the day are getting away with it scot-free? What is the Attorney-General going to do about law and order and maintaining the reputation of British justice if he lets those Tory people in MI5 get away with it?

The Attorney-General: The litigation that has been conducted on behalf of the Government in these courts and in courts elsewhere in the world has resulted in an affirmation of the duty of confidentiality that is owed by those who have served in the security services. It is extremely important that, where there is reliable evidence of criminal activity, that should be investigated. The Director of Public Prosecutions has expressed his conclusions with regard to the assertions that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) has in mind. It is equally important that the duty of confidentiality owed by former members of the security services should be enforced. If any Government were to shrink from enforcing that duty, the cost would soon be paid, not in money, but in lives.

Mr. Lawrence: Is it not typical of Opposition Members to attach such a low financial price to the upholding of a principle so important for a free society as the confidentiality of those secret service agents who are sworn to protect the nation's secrets?

The Attorney-General: This is yet another example of the wide gulf between the opinions of all our constituents on the one hand and the opinions of certain Opposition Members on the other.

Landlord and Tenant Laws

64. Mr. Fraser: To ask the Attorney-General what studies the Lord Chancellor is currently undertaking into the law relating to landlord and tenant, in the light of recent reports from the Law Commission.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): The Government have under current consideration three recent reports of the Law Commission relating to different aspects of landlord and tenant law.

Mr. Fraser: During his canvassing in north Kensington, has the Solicitor-General been struck by the unanswerable case for leasehold reform for flats? Since the report of the Law Commission into strata title makes it immensely easier to have a framework for enfranchisement, will the Government announce that they are now as in favour in principle of leasehold enfranchisement for flats as for houses?

The Solicitor-General: As the hon. Gentleman knows, that is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. The Law Commission's most recent report is an agenda for consultation.

North Report

65. Mr. Allen: To ask the Attorney-General what further consideration he has given to the implications for prosecuting policy of the North report on road traffic law.

The Attorney-General: The implications for prosecution policy of the report of the road traffic law review will not become apparent until the detailed scrutiny of its recommendations now under way is complete, and my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Transport and for the Home Department have made such legislative proposals as they may then think fit.

Mr. Allen: The Attorney-General may not be aware that in Transport Questions one of his colleagues said that the North report recommendations might come before the House before the summer recess—[Interruption.] He said a lot else besides. If the Under-Secretary of State for Transport wants to contribute, he will have to wait. Does the Attorney-General—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. These are questions for the Attorney-General.

Mr. Allen: Well, I hope that we get further than we did with the Under-Secretary of State for Transport. Does the Attorney-General agree with the Solicitor-General that the courts will have the power in future to extend sentences relating to "bad driving" should the "bad driving" offence, which is one of the recommendations of the North report, be agreed by the House? Does the Attorney-General endorse that view?

The Attorney-General: That is not a matter for me. It is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. However, as I am always anxious to express an opinion on something that interests me, the style of drafting recommended, by the North report when referring to "bad driving" or "really bad driving" is very much to be commended as everybody understands what that means. It is a welcome suggestion.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Overseas Aid (Education Projects)

75. Dr. Michael Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of overseas aid from Britain is directed towards education in the recipient countries.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Chris Patten): In 1987 almost a fifth of the bilateral programme —some £140 million—was spent on aid for education and training.

Dr. Clark: I am delighted with my hon. Friend's reply. However, does he agree that to spend money on education aid to Third world countries is one of the best ways of priming the pump? Bearing in mind the many excellent education books in English, does he agree that it is vital that there should be a supply of English language teachers, and is he giving that sufficient priority?

Mr. Patten: I agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of English language teaching as part of our aid programme. We are expanding English language teaching and 275 English language teachers are now working in developing countries with the support of our aid programme. I am pleased that we have recently managed to increase our English language teaching programme in Sri Lanka, Tanzania, and China. I should like to pay a particular tribute to the British Council, which acts as our agent and does the job with considerable distinction.

Dr. Reid: Is it not a shameful indictment of the Government that when the British people have shown unbounded generosity towards charitable works at home as well as abroad, the Government have halved overseas aid as a percentage of GNP? Will he match the generosity of the people who elected the Government by pledging the Government to support the 0·7 per cent. campaign to make that proportion of GNP the measure of our overseas aid?

Mr. Patten: The premise of the hon. Gentleman's question is wrong. It is important and valuable that we are now increasing our aid programme in real terms.

Joint Funding Scheme

76. Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which organisations receive grant assistance from his Department under the joint funding scheme; and what criteria are applied to applications from organisations seeking assistance under this scheme.

Mr. Chris Patten: During the 1987-88 financial year my Department provided grants under the joint funding scheme to 53 non-governmental organisations. I shall arrange for a list to be published in the Official Report.

There are four main criteria: projects must be designed to promote economic and social development, rather than emergency relief; they must fit the local communities' aspirations and needs; the costs and benefits must be clearly identified within realistic objectives; and the projects must have the potential to become self-sustaining after our support has come to an end.

Mr. Mitchell: Will my hon. Friend draw public attention, not only to the substantial increase in public funds forthis important scheme, but to the clearly targeted developmental work that it does? In particular, will he note that the sum available from public funds has quadrupled during the past six years and that it goes on a pound-for-pound basis to match the work that major national charities are doing in this important area?

Mr. Patten: I agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of the work of non-governmental organisations. They can often operate at a level that is more difficult for Government-to-Government programmes. That is why this year we have increased by 75 per cent. on the original allocation for last year the sum that is going to the joint funding scheme, which is supporting about 800 projects throughout the world.

Mr. Jack: In considering the non-governmental projects, many of which concern tropical rain forests, will my hon. Friend ensure that the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology has sufficient time for its projects on tree cloning to come to fruition?

Mr. Patten: It may well take tropical forests slightly longer to come to fruition than I am likely to be standing at this Dispatch Box. [Interruption.] I am not sure whether I am lucky or unlucky in making that observation. I wholly agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of forestry as part of our aid programme and that is why we have increased the funds available to it. One of the areas in which non-governmental organisations can work most valuably is in environmental protection and enhancement.

Aid Donors

77. Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the average percentage of gross national product given in aid in 1987 by donor nations, excluding the United Kingdom, that are members of (a) the Group of Seven leading industrialised nations, (b) the European Community, and (c) the development assistance committee of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

79. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the average percentage of gross national product given in aid in 1987 by donor nations, excluding the United Kingdom that are members of (a) the Group of Seven leading industrialised nations, (b) the European Community, and (c) the development assistance committee of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

Mr. Chris Patten: In 1987 net aid as a percentage of GNP, excluding the United Kingdom, averaged 0·32 per cent. for the Group of Seven; 0·5 per cent. for those members of the European Community for which the development assistance committee has published figures; and 0·34 per cent. for, all development assistance committee members.

Mr. Barron: Does the Minister accept that, of the 18 OECD major industrialised countries, we now come 14th compared with 12th in 1979? Does he further accept that we are below the average on every percentage that he read out? In 1979, when the Labour Government were in office, 0·52 per cent. of our GNP went towards the 0·7 per cent. target that was set by the United Nations 20 years ago. Now only 0·28 per cent. of our GNP is spent on that. Does the Minister understand that it is no good saying that the figures are better than last year's? We are trying to cure the evil of the wrong distribution of wealth throughout the world and we can do that only by aiming for the target percentage of our GNP, not by saying that we are giving more than we gave last year.

Mr. Patten: It is probably the case that most of the international financial institutions to which the hon. Gentleman may have inadvertently referred would be more encouraged if more developing countries and more countries in general followed the economic policies of this Government rather than if they continued as they are. Thanks to our economic growth our aid programme is now growing in real terms. We shall spend over £90 million more this year than last year.

Mr. Clarke: In view of the appalling nature of these comparisons, will the Minister tell the House when he last had a person-to-person meeting with the Prime Minister on these matters?

Mr. Patten: I last had a person-to-person meeting with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on these matters about a month ago, since when I have been in several countries and she may have been, too. I suspect that, unusually, the hon. Gentleman may have drafted his supplementary question before he listened to my reply.

Mr. Rowe: Is it not absolutely true that my hon. Friend the Minister is to be congratulated on the considerable progress that he has made towards achieving many of the objectives of the aid programme that were manifestly not met when the Labour party was in power? Is it not also true that there is still a large gap between rich and poor countries and that it is to all our benefit if we in richer countries share a larger proportion of our income with poorer countries?

Mr. Patten: I agree with my hon. Friend. That is why we have to continue giving a lead on issues such as the further liberalisation of trade and debt. I am delighted that the Toronto economic summit reached the conclusion that it did, which is a great tribute to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I hope that this week the Paris Club will make a good deal of progress in implementing the terms of the Toronto economic summit communiqué.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is much better to give an increasing amount of aid? Rather than merely considering a higher percentage of a low gross domestic product, is it not better to have perhaps a slightly smaller percentage of a GDP which is now very much greater?

Mr. Patten: I agree with my hon. Friend. As I said before, the effects of the Labour party's policies on our economic growth rate would ensure, without anything being done to the amount being spent on aid, that our aid as a proportion of GNP went up rapidly, and soon.

Miss Lestor: Does the hon. Gentleman not recognise that there is a distinction between an intellectually attractive presentation of a policy and the reality of a performance? If he continues to argue that what is important is not the proportion of GNP but the amount that he has contributed, unless that amount goes up as a proportion of GNP it follows that the gap between the countries that we are supposed to be assisting and the richer countries will widen. That is why the United Nations had a target of 0·7 per cent. of GNP, so that when GNP went up the proportion to the developing countries would also go up. That is where the Minister is failing the Third world.

Mr. Patten: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for what I think began as a compliment. [Interruption.] Perhaps I misjudged her. I apologise for that. It is important that our aid programme should go up in real terms, which it is doing. It is also important that our economic growth rate is now sufficiently rapid and based on sufficiently secure foundations to make sure that we can play the leading role in the international financial institutions and in issues of trade and debt that a country of our history should be able to play. Alas, under our predecessors, we were on the way to becoming a developing country.

Housing Action Trusts

3.31 pm

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his intention to enforce the takeover of local authority housing by Government-appointed housing action trusts.

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Mr. William Waldegrave): Subject to approval by both Houses of Parliament of the Housing Bill and of the necessary designation orders, my right hon. Friend proposes to establish housing action trusts in:

Lambeth: Loughborough and Angell Town estates;
Southwark: North Peckham and Gloucester Grove estates;
Tower Hamlets: Solander Gardens, Shadwell Gardens, Berner, Boundary and Holland estates and part of Ocean estate;
Leeds: Halton Moor, Seacroft South and Gipton estates; Sandwell: Windmill Land and Whiteheath estates; and Sunderland: Downhill, Townend Farm and Hylton Castle estates.

Maps have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses today showing the areas that might be covered by the housing action trusts. My right hon. Friend will shortly be appointing consultants to advice him further. Final decisions on the areas to be designated will be taken in the light of the consultants' studies and of local views.

My right hon. Friend has chosen those areas taking account of the matters listed in clause 60(5) of the Housing Bill. The combination of problems associated with the rundown council housing in those areas is such that a radical approach is necessary to give tenants decent housing, better services and more choice. It will therefore be the job of each housing action trust, in consultation with the residents, to carry out a major programme of renovation, to bring empty council properties back into use, to improve the way in which estates are looked after and generally to help improve the economic, environmental and social conditions of the area.

The creation of housing action trusts provides an opportunity to target resources on some of the areas where major concentrations of poor quality public sector stock create very intractable problems. I therefore hope that the local authorities concerned will co-operate fully in setting up housing action trusts so that tenants can gain as soon as possible from the benefits that they will bring. My right hon. Friend is writing to the leaders of the councils concerned today about the proposals. He is also writing to all local residents who might be affected.

Mr. Soley: Yet again, we have had to drag information out of a reluctant Government who are increasingly embarrassed by their housing crisis.

First, why is there no choice for tenants or residents in those areas? What has happened to the word "choice"? Secondly, why has there been so little consultation? Thirdly, what guarantees will we be given that the local communities will not be squeezed out and replaced by people from other areas? What guarantees are the Government giving to homeless people so that they will be able to get housing in those areas and to local authorities so that they can provide that housing for those people?

The Minister said that he was anxious to get empty council property back into use. Will he make sure that the housing action trusts have the same powers to bring back into use empty Government-owned properties, given that there are three times as many empty Government-owned properties as there are empty council-owned properties? Will housing action trusts have the same powers to bring back into use empty housing association properties—there are marginally more of those properties empty than there are council-owned properties—and empty private sector housing, given that there are nearly twice as many of those properties empty as there are empty public-sector properties?

I recognise that, in Committee, the Minister conceded that tenants would be able to go back to the local authority when a housing action trust was wound up if they so wished. It is important that he ensures that that is not just a paper promise, that local authorities have the housing finance to allow them to take those tenants back and that cuts are not imposed on local authorities which would make it impossible for them to offer to repurchase the estates.

What guarantees do we have that landlords such as Mr. van Hoogstraten will not benefit, given that he has already described the Housing Bill as a "step in the right direction"?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) knows the answers to most of those questions because he asked them in Committee and he was given the answers then. I had intended to answer a written question put down by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), but I am delighted to answer this matter orally.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith knows very well that there will be consultation with the tenants at all stages and that all the plans and directions, if any, from the Secretary of State will be published. I believe that the hon. Gentleman would welcome that. The hon. Gentleman also knows that the interests of local people are central to the housing action trusts. I had hoped that, rather than taking the usual negative attitude, he would have welcomed what amounts to an additional £125 million over three years for six of the areas where there is most need for that money to be spent. I am sorry that he has not found it in him to welcome that. There is a duty to co-operate with local authorities on homelessness, and he is aware of that. I believe that it is slightly unlikely that there will be Ministry of Defence properties on any of the estates, but if there are, we shall hope to get them back into action as soon as possible.

The hon. Gentleman is well aware of the system for the return of the estates to local authorities if they are willing to have them back, and these authorities will be free to purchase the estates back if they wish to do so.

There was no need for the cheap remark about Mr. van Hoogstraten because the hon. Gentleman knows that any transfers out of HATs will be to "tenant-guaranteed" landlords, housing associations and co-operatives. It is a bit of a cheap scare story to bring Mr. van Hoogstraten into this.

I believe that, in the next few weeks, when the tenants in the designated areas receive the information about the immense potential benefits on offer, they will take a slightly more generous and positive view than the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. John Heddle (Mid-Staffordshire): Will my hon. Friend accept the congratulations of all the tenants in the areas that he has mentioned, as the opportunity that he has just announced will enable them to release themselves from the clutches of unsympathetic local authority landlords? Will my hon. Friend accept that HATs will do more to relieve the plight of the homeless? Will he further accept that those areas such as Southwark, which has rent arrears of £30 million, will be relieved from debt? Does my hon. Friend also agree that HATs will produce better housing management and more sympathetic living conditions for those who are currently homeless?

Mr. Waldegrave: I welcome my hon. Friend's support for this extremely important matter. To put it politely, it is perfectly obvious that some local authorities that cover the estates cannot grapple with the severity of the problems that they presently face—[HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"]—and central Government are now bringing resources to bear to do that. Labour Members may ask why, but the answer is exactly the same as why they and the leadership of their party would like to see different people in power in many of those local authorities.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): What will be the constitutional position of the new areas in Leeds? On Saturdays, many Leeds constituents consult their Members of Parliament about the allocation of houses and repairs, and I wish to know whether it will be in order now to table private notice questions and to write letters to Ministers. Will the Secretary of State take the place of the local authority? If he is not to do that, who is?

Mr. Waldegrave: The right hon. Gentleman is running a little ahead. The HATs will not be established until the House and another place have debated the matter. In due couse, it will be for the boards of the HATs to deal with management problems. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be ultimately responsible to the House.

Sir George Young (Ealing, Acton): Is my hon. Friend aware that his statement will be widely welcomed, not least by tenants in difficult-to-let estates throughout the country, who have been failed by their local authorities? Will he tell the House when the first HAT will be up and running? Will he confirm that in many instances there is a need for physical improvement and better management afterwards? Will he confirm that HATs will put into effect localised and efficient repair services to maintain the momentum that the HATs begin?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend, as usual on these matters, is entirely right. We hope to have HATs set up early next year. If the Labour party feels that the playing of party games in opposition on all these matters is inevitable, that will delay the bringing of benefits to the tenants whom they claim to represent. The localised management of the priority states project teams and Estate Action, if carried forward, will be carried forward also in the HATs. That is what we shall be doing.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): As a representative of a borough that is to have an HAT, may I say that more Government money for housing in rundown areas of England is welcome? However, I have one or two questions for the Minister for Housing and Planning. First, is this a "this is your choice" designation or is it a "there is no alternative" designation? Will there be a veto? Will tenants be able to approve the proposal, or will it go ahead irrespective of the views of local people.

Secondly, will representatives be on the boards of the HATs, having been democratically elected by local people? Thirdly, will the rents and the tenants' rights that are now enjoyed continue to be enjoyed in a similar way after the trusts have been created? Lastly, will local councils be able to nominate all the homeless in an HAT area, people whom they have a duty and a responsibility to house?

Mr. Waldegrave: We debated some of the hon. Gentleman's questions in Committee. First, I hope that there will be local representatives on the boards of the trusts. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and other departmental Ministers will be meeting local authorities to discuss these matters with them. The hon. Gentleman knows that there is no veto over the establishment of an HAT. Ultimately, it is for the House to decide whether a trust is established.

We have said repeatedly that rents will not increase before improvements have been made, and even then may increase only in line with local authority rents generally. As new money will be brought to bear—it will not be borrowing from the local authority—tenants will enjoy the benefit of smaller increases in rents than there would otherwise be for such improvements. They will remain secure tenants while they are in the HAT.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): Is there not a simple fact behind my hon. Friend's excellent statement: that the HATs are an imaginative way of bringing assistance to estates that have reached a level that is unacceptable? Is my hon. Friend aware that all men and women of good will will wish the initiative godspeed, not least on behalf of tenants who have suffered too much for too long?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend puts succinctly what is surely the truth. I have visited most of the estates where HATs are to be established, and I think that, between us, I and my ministerial colleagues have recently visited them all. Opposition Members know many of them extremely well. I should be most surprised if anyone were willing to say that the estates do not merit the best efforts of the House and additional resources to bring them into a better condition.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Is the Minister aware that I read out to the Secretary of State the list of estates that he presented at the Dispatch Box this afternoon during the all-night sitting on 14 June on the Housing Bill? When I read out exactly the same list, the Secretary of State said that no decision had been taken. When was the decision taken?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman is amazingly perspicacious. As a matter of fact, his memory is at fault —the list is not the same.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Is it not a sign of the confusion of the Labour party—not on housing policy alone—that it does not know whether to applaud or to deprecate my hon. Friend's announcement? Will my hon. Friend confirm that if—as Conservative Members believe to be the case—the housing action trusts turn out to be a great success, this pilot scheme will be extended to other parts of the country?

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes, and doubtless at that point the pushmi-pullyu opposite—which remains stationary, emitting peculiar noises—will come down on our side and join us, as it has on the right to buy and so many other policies.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): On many deplorable estates, not least in the borough of Tower Hamlets, the issue that the Minister must consider is whether this is the best way of dealing with those problems or whether he should pursue the previous policy of priority estate projects and begin to repair some of the housing investment programme allocations that have been so grievously reduced in the past few years.

I fear that I know already what the answer will be, but can the Minister really say, despite what he has previously said about consultation, that if both the local authority and the tenants on the estate do not wish to have a housing action trust, nevertheless it will be imposed upon them?

Mr. Waldegrave: I answered the last question when I told the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) that it will be for the House to decide.

On the right hon. Gentleman's first question, he knows very well that if additional allocations were made to a number of boroughs—perhaps I say this in relation to his borough—the way in which that money would be spent would be extremely unpredictable, to put it politely, and it may be wasted. I believe that this is the best way forward. We shall continue Estate Action and the priority estates programme where that is the best way, but in some areas the problems are so great that a much longer and more concentrated direction of resources is now needed.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): I congratulate my hon. Friend on his statement today and especially on choosing Leeds. Is this not the implementation of a policy for real action that will bring tangible benefits to many people in the rundown areas? Will he especially monitor the progress of the housing action trust when they get under way, so that we can be kept fully in the picture as to their success?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend makes a good point. We should monitor this new policy very closely, and we shall do so. I join him in saying that the policy is likely to bring real benefits, choice and hope to some areas that have been short of them for too long.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): Does the Minister accept that Sandwell's housing problems have been considerably worsened in recent years by the consistent underfunding of its HIP allocation? That is not politics, but fact. Can he assure us that the local authority and the local voluntary housing sector will be encouraged to set up these trusts, or will the trusts be confined entirely to the private sector, which has consistently failed boroughs such as Sandwell for many years?

Mr. Waldegrave: These trusts are not in the private sector, but are part of the public sector. They will be established by the House and they will be responsible to my right hon. Friend. We hope for good co-operation from the local authorities, the many housing associations and other housing experts operating in those areas.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): Does my hon. Friend accept that his statement today will bring real relief and help to people in Labour-controlled areas who have been left to rot by successive Labour councils in places in which no Labour Members would wish to live? Does he accept that there will be some disappointment that his statement does not include more areas to be designated as housing action trusts? When does he expect to be able to extend the housing action trusts to Bradford, Manchester, Newham and other areas where the Labour party has failed the people?

Mr. Waldegrave: That remains open to us for the future. If the new policy goes well, I hope that additional housing action trusts will be nominated. My hon. Friend was entirely right when he said that if anybody can doubt that national resources are now needed for these areas to bring them back into decent—[Interruption.] If anyone believes that some of the present housing management is capable of that, he is living in cloud-cuckoo-land.

Mrs. Harriet Harman (Peckham): Can the Minister assure the people who live in north Peckham and Gloucester grove that they will benefit from any additional investment in their estates? Does he recognise that, based on the experience of the London Docklands development corporation in the north of the borough, there is widespread concern that existing tenants will not benefit? It is feared that they will be driven out in favour of those who can buy.

Mr. Waldegrave: There is not all that much comparison between a UDC and an HAT. The interests of existing tenants are central to an HAT's purpose. The failure or the success of housing action trusts will be judged by whether they have brought benefits to the hon. Lady's constituents who are tenants of those estates.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Why has there been no announcement for Bristol, with all its inner-city housing problems that my hon. Friend and I know so well? Could it be that it helps if there is co-operation with the local authority when establishing housing action trusts? One sees from the past actions of the Labour-controlled Bristol city council that it is more interested in bigotry than in caring for the community.

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend will well understand that Bristol was not forgotten. I was interested to hear him say that he believes that a housing action trust for Bristol might be worth considering for the future. He is quite right that we face the spectacle of Bristol city council wasting a considerable sum of ratepayers' money by pointlessly petitioning against the UDC, which most people in Bristol warmly welcome.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): Reverting to the two estates in my constituency, if the majority of the tenants oppose the order, will that influence the Government and will they not proceed with it? Secondly——

Mr. Speaker: Briefly.

Mr. John Fraser: —if the Government are to provide extra resources for estates such as Angell town, why will the same resources be denied to similar estates in the neighbourhood, such as Tulse hill and Stockwell park? What is the difference in principle? Thirdly, will the Minister give an undertaking that all vacancies will be made available to Lambeth people, and will Lambeth be able to spend only 20 per cent. of its capital receipts, or the whole lot?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman opposes these proposals but then asks why the same cannot apply to other estates. There were difficult decisions to make about the estates that were in most need. We have selected some estates that we believe will benefit dramatically. On the hon. Gentleman's first important point, I have already made it clear twice to his right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) and to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) that it is for this House ultimately to decide whether to pursue housing action trusts.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): What consultation was there with Sunderland borough council before the decision was made to designate estates in its area? Is the Minister aware that public housing in Sunderland is extremely well run and that the only problem it faces is the shortage of funds from central Government?

Mr. Waldegrave: There were no formal consultations with local authorities before the estates were designated. That has always been made clear. The time for consultation is now. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State looks forward to discussions with the Sunderland borough council and others in the months ahead. There is nothing new about that. It is right that the proposals should be put to the House before they are discussed with outside interests. I have no doubt that had we done it the other way round the hon. Gentleman would have been jumping up and down and saying, "How dare you consult outside before coming to the House to announce the list?"

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that this is a private notice question and that we have had a long run on it. I shall give precedence on a subsequent occasion to those hon. Members who have not been called.

Type 23 Frigates (Orders)

3.53 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Tim Sainsbury): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the Government's plans to place orders for further Duke class type 23 frigates.

The type 23 frigate will form the backbone of the Royal Navy's anti-submarine warfare surface force in the future. Principal features of this ship include a towed array sonar to detect low-noise submarines, a 4·5 in gun, a helicopter capable of carrying Sting Ray torpedoes and sonobuoys, Harpoon anti-ship sea-skimming missiles and vertical launch Sea Wolf missiles to counter the air threat. The type 23 will be more capable than the types of ships it is replacing.

Tenders were sought for orders for one to four ships from the four main warship building yards in the United Kingdom. We are very pleased with the outcome of the competition. The precise value of the order is commercially confidential but the prices submitted were very keen. Following evaluation of the tenders, I am pleased to be able to tell the House that an order for three ships is to be placed with Yarrow Shipbuilders Ltd. The ordering of all three ships from Yarrow provides best value for money in terms of prices and contract conditions. The average unit cost of the three new ships is some £10 million below the average of the last three ordered in 1986. That reflects, among other things, the keenness of the competition; the benefits of batch ordering; improved efficiency in the shipyards, due in part to improved fabrication methods; and greater experience of building those types of vessel.

I take this opportunity to thank all the yards which participated in this excellent competition and which submitted such competitive bids. Although tenders were sought for up to four vessels in order to explore the benefits of batch ordering, an order now for four—even if all from one yard—would not be significantly more attractive in terms of unit price than an order for three. Therefore, we have decided that it is best to include the fourth ship in the next batch competition. That will enable all the yards that participated in this competition to have an opportunity to bid again for that ship, together with further possible orders.

This decision brings to 10 the number of new frigates now on order, excluding the three type 22 frigates accepted by the Royal Navy from the shipbuilders this year. In recent days, there has been much comment in the press and from the Opposition about the size, age and availability of our surface fleet. I regret that much of it has been ill informed. My announcement today demonstrates in the best possible way the Government's commitment to maintaining a highly capable escort force of about 50 destroyers and frigates.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): We welcome the Minister's statement, but we also have grave misgivings about it. We welcome it because it will mean an enhancement of our surface fleet, which has been much reduced in capability and in relative effectiveness because of the Government's gross inability properly to manage the defence economy over the past few years. We also welcome it because it will provide much-needed job opportunities and safeguards in Glasgow, where the vessels will be built. My hon. Friends the Members for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway) and for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) are very pleased that Yarrow Shipbuilders has won the order, which will mean maintaining jobs in an area that is currently ravaged by unemployment as a result of the Government's policies.

However, my hon. Friends the Members for Tyneside constituencies are completely dismayed by the Minister's announcement. The recent completion of a type 23 frigate on time and within budget gave them the hope that Swan Hunter would be given one frigate out of this order, or out of the four—a point to which I shall return. Instead, Swan Hunter has been given nothing, which will mean an almost immediate loss of 700 jobs and a potential loss of 2,000 jobs in the near future, with the possible complete closure of the yard.

We note that the original announcement concerning the frigates was made at last year's Tory party conference. We are grateful that the Minister, unlike so many of his colleagues, has on this occasion used the House to make such an important announcement. In making the observation that this is the second announcement of the same order, I note that at last year's Tory party conference the Secretary of State for Defence received 32 seconds of applause for his announcement there. Are we to understand that that is now to be the Government's technique for ordering three frigates a year—once at the Tory party conference, and once in the House?

It should be remembered that the requirement for three frigates a year is a basic requirement laid down in the Select Committee's report. Are the Government returning to ordering one frigate a year, as they have done since 1981—a policy, incidentally, that has reduced the Navy even further than was envisaged by Sir John Nott in 1981? That led to the resignation of one of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues, but he is not particularly concerned.

Can the Minister give an assurance on the orders? When will the ships be delivered—or are we to have another announcement about that? If tenders were sought for four frigates and if, as the statement said, there are significant advantages in batch ordering, why are the Government ordering only three out of four? Why is the fourth frigate to become number one for next year, and how many are to be ordered next year? What is the Government's continuing policy—or are they dealing with the matter on an ad hoc basis?

As the Select Committee said in its recent report, the Navy desperately needs surface ships if it is to service our commitments in the Gulf and the south Atlantic and to NATO. Although the announcement is welcome news for some of our yards and is undoubtedly a welcome enhancement of our surface fleet, it will lead to dismay on Tyneside and is certainly not enough for our Navy.

Mr. Sainsbury: The hon. Gentleman is very hard to please. His reaction to the announcement, which he is grudgingly prepared to admit is good news, reminds me rather of the remark attributed to Oscar Wilde when he first saw the Niagara falls—that they would be more impressive if they flowed the other way.

The hon. Gentleman asked a number of questions, and it may not be possible for me to answer them all. He asked particularly when the ships would be delivered. As he knows, for operational reasons we do not give acceptance dates in advance, but we expect fabrication of the first of the three ships to start in about six months' time, and for work on the others to follow at roughly six-month intervals. He also asked why there should be three rather than four ships. I thought that I had explained that clearly in my statement. It is perfectly acceptable for the fourth ship to be included in the next order, for which we expect to invite tenders next year.

The hon. Gentleman referred, rather to my surprise, to much reduced capability in the Royal Navy. I entirely reject that allegation. The new ships, like others in the Royal Navy, are highly capable—much more capable than the ships that they are replacing.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I ask for brief questions? We have a heavy day ahead of us.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is not a very happy precedent for a Minister responsible for the Navy to start quoting Oscar Wilde? However, apart from his last few remarks, my hon. Friend's announcement will be warmly welcomed.

Does my hon. Friend agree that it is important to emphasise that the new types of frigate being ordered have a vast capability compared with those that they will replace? Will he be able to tell us soon when the other orders will be made, so that we can keep our commitment to a surface fleet of around 50 major ships?

Mr. Sainsbury: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for his reaction. I can confirm that the ships are a great deal more capable, particularly in their anti-submarine warfare capability: they have much enhanced sonar capability, and are also much quieter. In addition, they carry a smaller crew—170 as opposed to 220, which was the complement of the previous type of anti-submarine warfare ship.

The next competition will be next year. We have not yet decided how many ships will be involved, but the number will be consistent with an ordering pattern to retain a modern and highly capable fleet of about 50 destroyers and frigates.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): Does the Minister include the Select Committee on Defence in his sweeping dismissal of the Government's critics as being ill informed? In particular, does he challenge the Committee's assessment that no fewer than 25 of the existing escort vessels will reach the end of their planned lives over the next 10 years, and that that means 14 orders over and above what he has announced today if the surface fleet is not to become smaller and less capable than it is now? Why do the Government not attempt a planned approach to ordering, instead of the drip-feed approach that they have demonstrated again today?

Mr. Sainsbury: I am glad to say that I did not describe the Select Committee as ill informed. I referred to the reaction to its report, much of which has been ill informed, particularly the reaction on the Opposition Benches. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman, who is I believe a member of the Committee, will know that paragraph 72 of its report refers to the 25 ships that he has just mentioned, and also suggests that two orders are required this year to retain the escort fleet at about 50. I have just announced an order for three.

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): Does my hon. Friend accept that this is excellent news for the Royal Navy, for Yarrow Shipbuilders and for the hundreds of subcontractors who will benefit from the orders? Excellent as it is, however, the news does not mean that my hon. Friend is out of the wood in his determination to keep a destroyer frigate force of about 50. Does he accept that he must order a further two next year, two in 1990, three in 1991 and two in 1992 just to keep pace with the aging quality of the present fleet?

While I have no doubt that my hon. Friend can do that, would it not make sense for him to be able to tell the House as soon as possible that it is his intention, and that it is in the long-term costings? That is the best way to achieve confidence in the Navy, and among other yards that failed this time but stand to succeed in subsequent orders.

Mr. Sainsbury: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his welcome for the announcement, and for what he said about Yarrow's and particularly about subcontractors. A large number of companies throughout the country will benefit from the subcontracting work associated with this major defence contract, which is not always the case.

I take my hon. Friend's point about the need to order new ships to keep the capability and numbers of the escort fleet up to the required level. My hon. Friend will have heard what I have said about another order next year. I think that he will understand why I do not give precise numbers or timings, looking several years ahead. I am, however, happy to repeat our commitment to retaining an escort fleet of about 50 ships, and to assure him that they will be very capable. The new ships are much more efficient and effective that those that they are replacing.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): Notwithstanding the fully justified reservations of my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers), the Minister will be aware that the news will be greeted with delight and satisfaction on the Clyde, particularly in my constituency. It is certainly good news for the Clyde shipbuilding industry and the Royal Navy. It follows not from ill-informed criticism, but from extremely well-informed criticism relating to the need to keep our service fleet up to strength at about 50.

The Government's good-sense decision reflects—for once, perhaps—a recognition of Britain's real defence needs in the real world and on the real seas, rather than the nuclear preoccupation of the fantasy world in which some military strategists persist in living. This is good news for Glasgow and very good news for the constituency and Yarrow's, which is a centre of excellence. I offer the Minister thanks from my constituents.

Mr. Sainsbury: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his reaction, which, as he said himself, was perhaps a little more genuine and honest than that of his hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers), who seemed to be looking for reasons to complain about good news. I can do no better than to say that a total of 27 major naval vessels with a value of nearly £4·6 million are now on order for the Royal Navy, or under construction. Some 64 major ships and submarines have been ordered by the Government since they came to power in 1979.

Mr. David Martin (Portsmouth, South): Will my hon. Friend confirm that the money saved by the very efficient procurement of these ships will be kept within the defence budget for further procurement?

Mr. Sainsbury: I am glad to be able to confirm that. One of the principal reasons for our drive for more competitiveness and value for money in our procurement expenditure is to provide for the opportunity to buy more equipment with the money saved.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Does the Minister need to be reminded of the bitter disappointment that will be experienced in Cammell Laird this afternoon as a result of his announcement? May I remind him of Cammell Laird's substantial order book for conventional submarines? Will he open negotiations with the yard in the near future on the timing of the placing of those orders, so that any employment effects of today's announcement can be minimised? Will he assure the House that all these orders were decided on price? Having spoken to the shop stewards before coming here, may I extend an invitation to the Minister, now that the tenders have been decided, to visit the yard in the near future?

Mr. Sainsbury: I appreciate what the hon. Gentleman says about the disappointment that will be felt by Cammell Laird. As I said in my statement, I appreciate the contributions of all the yards that took part in the competition, and the keen bids that they put in. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the award of the three ships to Yarrow Shipbuilders Ltd. was on the basis of price. I may add that Yarrow's bid was fully compliant in terms of contract conditions.

A number of other ships will be coming forward for invitation to tender. We recently had a presentation on the aviation support ship. I have already mentioned inviting tenders for a further batch of type 23s next year. There will be further orders for auxiliary oiler replenishment vessels, single-role minehunters and type 2400s in due course. I shall be happy in due course to pay a visit to Cammell Laird to see the shipyard.

Mr. Neville Trotter (Tynemouth): Does my hon. Friend accept that, although there will be general welcome for this addition to the strength of the Royal Navy and the work for the contracting part of the marine industry—the subcontractors—there will be great disappointment on Tyneside that Swan Hunter, the major frigate builder, did not share in the order? Does he accept that there is a strong case for having a long-term ordering programme to avoid uncertainty, with all the problems that that rise gives to for employment?

Will my hon. Friend say a little more about the next batch of type 23s? When he refers to next year, does he mean that the process will start then or that the order will be placed then?

Mr. Sainsbury: As I said in answer to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) about Cammell Laird, so I appreciate the disappointment in my hon. Friend's constituency at Swan Hunter. I am equally grateful to it for its participation and contribution to this effective competition. As I said, there will be another order next year. I shall not commit myself now to saying how many ships will be involved, but it will be a batch order and the process will start next year. It might even come to order next year—it is as yet too early to say. As with Cammell

[Mr. Sainsbury]

Laird, there are Royal Navy ships under construction at Swan Hunter, which I hope will submit competitive tenders for the future opportunities with which it will be provided.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): Is the Minister aware that what he has just said about a further batch order next year will be welcomed by every hon. Member with a naval shipbuilding interest in his constituency? In the meantime, his announcement today will be warmly welcomed on Clydeside, especially as it is clear that the order went to Yarrow strictly on merit—and as, without the order, Yarrow would have been faced with a substantial rundown in the labour force in the next few months.

Mr. Sainsbury: Of course, when I announced the intention to go out for another batch order next year it is clear that not all the yards can win if we place the orders in batches. That is the inevitable consequence of seeking the best value for money for the Navy. I hope that we please the whole House by getting effective competition and being able to order three ships at an average cost of about £10 million less than the previous group. The clear consequence is that not all yards can be successful on each occasion.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): I welcome my hon. Friend's statement this afternoon, but may I ask what reliance is he placing on the use of advanced weapons systems on surface vessels as a way of maintaining and, if possible, increasing their numbers and prolonging their lives?

Mr. Sainsbury: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's welcome for the announcement. The weapons systems and sonars and radars on the type 23s are, as, he would put it, modern and very capable. There are some advantages in some of the latest systems because they are easier to enhance and modernise than some of the older ones. That should enable us to keep some aspects of the sensors and weapons of the modern ships in the most up-to-date condition without the difficulty of refitting, which we have run into on previous occasions when we virtually had to rebuild some of the earlier Leanders.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): In associating myself with the general welcome for this announcement—particularly as a Scottish Member—may I associate myself with hon. Members on both sides who have argued that there is a case for a long-term ordering programme? Does the Minister agree that, as well as getting value for money, it is of great importance to maintain our warship building capacity? Without a long-term building programme there is a risk that some of it could be lost.

Mr. Sainsbury: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his welcome for the order. Of course, there are always requests for long-term programmes for this and that. He will be as aware as I am that long-term programmes tend to change, and the longer-term and more highly defined the programme, the less flexible it inevitably is. The last thing that we want to do is to commit ourselves too far in advance to ordering precise numbers of particular types of ship with particular categories of arms, sonars and radars, when we are faced with an evolving threat and must continually judge what is required against it.

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): Is my hon. Friend aware that, although his statement will give encouragement to the Royal Navy and Yarrow, it will give nothing but disappointment to my constituents in Vosper Thornycroft? May I take it that as a result of that disappointment, of which I am sure my hon. Friend is aware, his Department is bending every effort to assist Vosper Thornycroft in getting orders for both mine hunters and mine sweepers, particularly in the Gulf and for Arab states? Will he add anything in that respect?

Mr. Sainsbury: I appreciate what my hon. Friend said on behalf of Vosper Thornycroft, which is the third unsuccessful yard in this competition. I repeat to him what I said to our hon. Member the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) and to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) about the yards' participation in this competition. Like Swan Hunter and Cammell Laird, Vosper Thornycroft has an opportunity to tender for further orders that come along. Like the other yards, it has ships for the Royal Navy under construction, and it can bid for other work from overseas and from the civil sector as well as from the Ministry of Defence.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): Will the Minister accept that, while no one begrudges the work going to Yarrow, there is considerable disappointment about the announcement? In fact, it is a bit of a kick in the teeth for many in the north-east that not one of the orders has gone to Swan Hunter. What hope can the hon. Gentleman hold out for the thousands of workers whose livelihoods depend on Swan Hunter? Does the Minister agree that the merciless application of market forces should not be the only criterion he takes into account when deciding where to place such orders?

Mr. Sainsbury: I am glad to note the hon. Gentleman's enthusiastic welcome for defence orders of considerable size. I appreciate that not every yard can win if a batch order is placed, but I am somewhat surprised that he should suggest that we should incur extra expense by splitting the order. Depending on how the order was divided, the extra expense to the Royal Navy would have between £11 million and £20 million if we had not taken advantage of the best offer. We have a responsibility to ensure that that money is saved to be used for other equipment to ensure that we have the best possible Navy.

Sir Ian Lloyd (Havant): My hon. Friend will be aware that, apart from recent events in the Gulf, the evidence given before a Congressional defence committee last week—that modern weapons systems depend completely on their electronic capability—reinforces the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith). When was the specification for the electronic equipment frozen; how old will it be when it is installed; how frequently will it be updated?

Mr. Sainsbury: My hon. Friend will know better than most that it is difficult to answer that question because there are about 62 or 63 different systems in the type 23, and almost all of them have electronic components. The answer to his question would be different for each one, but

I take on board his point about the need, when ordering complex electronic equipment, to bring to bear the sort of approach that he recommends.

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South): Many—probably most—Opposition Members welcome the Minister's announcement as a step towards achieving his own target of 50 frigates. However, to achieve that goal would require ordering about two or three a year. Over the past five or six years the Government have averaged about one a year. To achieve the target would require far more than simply the ordering process that we have heard about. Does the Minister agree that perhaps his citing of Wilde was quite apt because many ships have been lost in the ordering process? To lose one was surely unfortunate, to lose two was careless, but to lose an extended family of ships amounts to neglect.

Mr. Sainsbury: In the relevant Oscar Wilde play the parents were found again. Perhaps the Select Committee's comments on the ordering rate overlooked the inevitable implications of a reduction in the overall size of the escort fleet from the figure in the 1970s down to about 50, which remains our target size. As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, paragraph 72 of the Select Committee report suggests a required ordering rate of 2·6 ships a year, which is the equivalent of two more orders this year. I have just announced three and that seems a good start towards achieving what the Committee asks for.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): My hon. Friend's announcement will be warmly welcomed with a great sigh of relief by the Royal Navy. That is because it is aware that it is not able to fulfil its peacetime commitments without withdrawing from some NATO exercises. It is extremely perturbed about the lack of type 23s, in particular the towed array sonar frigates required for the northern area. It is also worried about the impossibility of defending the sea lanes of communication in wartime. Will the Minister reassure the Navy by introducing into the long-term costings a clear programme of continuous ordering of surface units?

Mr. Sainsbury: While I welcome my hon. Friend's reaction to this order, may I say that I do not accept the "impossibility" as he puts it, of defending the sea lanes. The Royal Navy would feel that to say that was selling it short, given the ships that it has, let alone the new ships that we are talking about ordering. I agree that the towed array sonars, which will be one of the main weapons systems of the type 23s, give a greatly enhanced anti-submarine warfare capability, which will be of great value to the Royal Navy.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): May I also welcome today's announcement which will be greeted with enthusiasm throughout Scotland where we justifiably regard the words "Clyde-built" as demonstrating the pride that we feel? Can the Minister say whether emphasis is being placed by the Ministry on decentralisation of defence procurement expenditure? Is he aware that recent estimates show that 68 per cent. of this massive budget was concentrated in the south-east and south-west? Surely some of the pleas that we have heard from the northern regions of England show the need for decentralisation. Will the subcontracted steel come from Ravenscraig?

Mr. Sainsbury: It is apparent that the welcome for this order is not just from Scotland but from all those who have the interests of the Royal Navy at heart. Subcontract work is a matter for the prime contractor, and where he obtains his supplies is a matter for him. I am sure that he will find, as the hon. Lady would expect, some very competitive suppliers in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): Further to the points made by the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) and the hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway), may I ask my hon. Friend whether he agrees that this is magnificent news for the west of Scotland and a tribute to the professionalism and dedication of the management and work force in Yarrow who have won this contract on merit? Is my hon. Friend able to say anything more about the consequences of the contract for the preservation and creation of jobs? Does he agree that the lesson for the whole of Scottish industry is that the way to preserve and create jobs is to be competitive?

Mr. Sainsbury: Indeed. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his welcome. We estimate that about 10,000 jobs will be sustained in the defence industry by these orders. He is absolutely right that in defence equipment supply, as in other industrial and commercial activities, competitive effectiveness in meeting the customers' requirements most efficiently is the best way to ensure the preservation of jobs and to create more jobs in Scotland and throughout the country.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): While the Minister's announcement of the batch order will be welcomed by the Royal Navy, it will be bitter news for the community surrounding Swan Hunter, where it will immediately mean 700 redundancies in the short term and probably 2,000 in the not-so-long term. Many of those people will be constituents of mine who travel to and fro each day.

Has the Minister taken into account the fact that the three orders announced today may yet fall short of the "about 50" that the Royal Navy considers adequate, especially taking into account the increased down time in modern operations and the need to update and refit these vessels more regularly? Will the Minister also take into account the fact that we need not only to renew our vessels but to retain our capacity to renew them? If we close the yards, as is happening at present, we need never look for another conflict like that in the Falklands because we shall be unable to furnish the equipment to send to such a conflict.

Mr. Sainsbury: I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman's constituents, like other people in the area of Swan Hunter, will be disappointed that Swan Hunter has not won this order. Of course the size and shape of the work force at Swan Hunter are matters for the company, but I hope that its continuing programme to improve productivity and efficiency, of which I am aware, will enable the company to win extra orders from the Ministry of Defence, from the private sector or, indeed, from overseas.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): While warmly welcoming this order, which will be a valuable addition to the fleet, may I suggest to my hon. Friend that his financial problems next year may be even greater than they were this year, in that defence expenditure is projected to continue to decline in real terms as a proportion of Government expenditure and as a proportion of GDP? In those circumstances, how will he fulfil his worthwhile and laudable objective of a surface fleet of about 50?

[Mr. John Wilkinson]

Mr. Sainsbury: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his welcome for this order. Expenditure on defence is projected to remain at about a constant level for the next two years. This order is a demonstration of one of the best ways in which we can meet the objective that my hon. Friend and I share—getting better value for money. As I said, the average cost of the three ships for which I have just announced the order is about £10 million less than the last three which were ordered in 1986. That is getting better value for money through more effective procurement, and is one of the best ways to ensure that we can meet the requirements of the Ministry of Defence and the Navy.

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): The Minister's statement will be greeted with great relief on Clydeside and especially by my constituents. It is not often realised that Yarrow is the largest single employer in manufacturing industry in Strathclyde. There are about 5,500 jobs in Yarrow, and subcontractors will depend on this order. It is difficult to overestimate the importance of the order, and enormous credit is due to the management and work force who have won this order on merit.

I should like the Minister to try to be a little less reticent about the batch system and about what it means to defer one of the ships into the next batch. When does he expect to be more explicit about the number of ships and the timing of the next batch? So far he has been a little reticent about that.

Mr. Sainsbury: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's welcome for the order. Like some other hon. Members, he is seeking more information, but I am afraid that at this stage I am unable to give that to the House. Obviously, the batch system means that we order ships not singly but in groups. I have already announced that next year there will be another invitation to tender for a further batch. By normal standards that is quite precise. For the reasons that I have already advanced, I do not wish to commit myself further. I repeat our commitment to maintaining an escort fleet of about 50 ships. Those ships will be highly capable.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appreciate the interest in this statement and I hope that I have called all those hon. Members who have a direct interest. I shall call hon. Members who are still rising but I ask them to be brief because other hon. Members wish to take part in the subsequent debate.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): Does not the chorus of delight from the Opposition Benches contrast with the performance of previous Labour Governments? Does my hon. Friend agree that the viability of a shipbuilding industry in this country is a major factor in securing competitiveness for the building of warships? Has he given careful consideration to the effect on Swan Hunter, in particular, as a result of his decision?

Mr. Sainsbury: My hon. Friend is right in his observation. If I recall correctly, when the Labour party was in power from 1974 to 1979, it cut the defence budget on no fewer than five occasions, which does not give us great confidence about what it would do in the future. I assure my hon. Friend that we are conscious of his point and that we keep under review the overall capacity of the shipbuilding industry, as we do the ship repair industry, to meet the requirements of the Royal Navy.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): Is my hon. Friend aware that his welcome statement this afternoon will mark a major enhancement of our commitment to the defence of the east Atlantic and of NATO's northern flank, as well as to the pre-eminent reputation of our Royal Navy in anti-submarine warfare? However, will he be somewhat cautious about accepting the rather superficial arguments in favour of a longer-term batch ordering policy, not only because there are other priorities in defence procurement, but because it implies a sort of Buggins's turn, which cannot be in the long-term interests of our defence procurement policy?

Mr. Sainsbury: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those remarks, with which I very much agree. The Royal Navy contributes about 70 per cent. of the NATO surface fleet in the east Atlantic and the Channel. That is a reflection of the important contribution of the Royal Navy to the NATO Alliance.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): This is very good news for the Royal Navy, for Scotland and for Yarrow, but may I join my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) in articulating the fact that it is bad news for Swan Hunter, which is having considerable troubles with its present orders, particularly the AOR? When will my hon. Friend order more ships of the types that he mentioned, including ships for the amphibious forces, and will he lay down a more specific timetable for the next batch of type 23 frigates?

Mr. Sainsbury: One of the reasons why I cannot fully satisfy my hon. Friend's curiosity about the precise timing of the next order is that it takes quite a long time to analyse the tenders when they come in. As he will be aware, it is not at all unusual nowadays for there to be perhaps two or even three rounds of tendering to ensure that the Royal Navy obtains the best price and that the tenders are fully compliant with the contract conditions. That can take quite a long time and it is difficult to predict in advance exactly how long it will take. Therefore, I must leave my hon. Friend with no more information than I have already given to the House.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): Following the point of my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate (Mr. Banks), may I congratulate my hon. Friend on the excellent deal that he has struck? However, may I put it to him that we must keep at least two effective frigate builders in being, if we want to be competitive in future? That will almost certainly mean that, at some time in future, we shall have to pay a little more for our frigates than the price at which Yarrow would be able to produce them because, inevitably, Yarrow now has a strong competitive advantage. I put it to my hon. Friend that Swan Hunter should be that other yard.

Mr. Sainsbury: I aware that, to retain competition, we need more than on supplier. As my hon. Friend will recognise, we went out to four yards—not just two—all of which put in bids for that batch. I hope that a number of yards will continue to compete for future orders to ensure that we have competitive prices. I do not accept that that will necessarily mean that we shall have to pay more than we would otherwise do to ensure that we retain at least two yards with the capability of building new frigates.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): I appreciate that the order is an early stage, but is my hon. Friend able to confirm that the radar contract will be awarded to Plessey, which will be good news for its employees on the Isle of Wight, and can he say whether the helicopter requirement of those new warships will be met from existing resources, or whether additional helicopters will be required, which will be even more good news for Westland employees on the Isle of Wight?

Mr. Sainsbury: As I said earlier, there are a number of subcontractors and suppliers throughout the country, including the Isle of Wight, which are likely to benefit from the announcement of the order. In due course, those new frigates will carry the EH101 helicopter, which is currently being developed and is supplied by Westland. I hope that my hon. Friend's constituents, like constituents in many other parts of the country, will benefit from that order.

Points of Order

4.34 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the light of new information, according to a headline in The Evening Standard, I wonder whether there is any possibility of your reconsidering your decision, taken at 11.30 am, when the information was not available regarding my wish to make an application under Standing Order No. 20. The headline in The Evening Standard states:

"I reported Piper gas leak".

The article contained other assertions—[Interruption.] I represent, as do some other hon. Members, those people who have been widowed in this most tragic and ghastly accident.

In the light of the new information, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could make an application under Standing Order No. 20, requesting a statement regarding the urgent interviewing of those people who received telephone calls from people who later died on the rig, as the telephone calls, with all the publicity and emotion, may well be overprinted in the minds of those who received them.

Mr. Speaker: I fully understand the hon. Gentleman's concern about this matter, but I am not aware of anything new that has happened since we discussed the matter earlier today.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you confirm that there is a long-standing convention of this House, which has served us well over many years, that hon. Members, particularly senior Members, when abroad, do not criticise the Government of the day? Have you been able to reprimand the Leader of the Opposition for his disgraceful comments on his recent foreign trip?

Mr. Speaker: I am responsible for order in this House. I am not responsible for what anybody may say outside it.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It is not a matter for me. It is not a point of order at all. Is there a different point of order?

Mr. Marlow: It is a different point of order. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary is present in the Chamber at the moment, would it be possible for him to make a statement as to whether it is possible for him to withdraw the passport of the Leader of the Opposition?

Orders of the Day

European Communities (Finance) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

[Relevant document: Fifth Report from the Treasury and Civil Service Committee (House of Commons Paper No. 358 of Session 1987-88) on European Community Finance.]

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the reasoned amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

As the House will appreciate, as well as the report from the Treasury and Civil Service Committee, the debate also provides scope for consideration of the Community documents specified at column 122 of the Official Report for 7 July.

United Kingdom policy in the Community, throughout the past five years, has had three dominant aims. We have sought to put the Community's finances on a sound basis of good management; we have sought to bring discipline to CAP spending; and we have sought to make a reality of the Community's commitment to a genuine internal market, 320 million strong.

That agenda, originally set by Britain, has become the European agenda as well, and it is being carried into practice. The House heard from my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister only ten days ago about the progress made at Hanover towards the single market, the third of the objectives that I have described.

The Bill is concerned to implement the first two of those objectives—sound finance and control over agricultural spending—on the basis of the agreement that we achieved at the Brussels European Council last February. I believe that those achievements have been welcomed by the great majority on both sides of the House.

Attitudes towards the Community in the country at large, as well as in this House, have indeed moved a long way in recent years. The decade of debate about the merits of our membership is well behind us. The common objective now is to see how we can make the Community work as effectively as possible. Certainly that is where the interests of the United Kingdom lie, and the interests of Europe as well.

Of course, I do not by that imply that our perception of our interests will always be in line with the views of our partners. That is the nature of any genuine partnership. On such occasions—there have been many on the road to the Brussels and Hanover European Councils, and there will be many more—we press our country's case with vigour. So, quite rightly, do others. The challenge of Europe is to find what is best in each nation's position, and to offer that to the whole, making the most of our common strength. Real progress is being made when all can see their interests being advanced.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for giving way at this early stage. Will he assure the House that the combination of the effects of the Single European Act and the proposals in this measure will give ample opportunity for any member state, particularly our own, still to defend what it sees as its essential national interest, whether in financial or politico-economic matters? Is he satisfied of that, and can he reassure the House?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Yes. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me the opportunity to take one intervention at this stage. A large number of hon. Members wish to speak in the debate which, as so often, has started an hour late. I make no complaint about that, but I hope that the House will forgive me if I do not give way to a range of interventions, because I wish to set out the argument in support of the Bill as a whole.

I begin by acknowledging the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth). Incidentally, I reject the argument that it is wrong for us ever to shift our views for the sake of a common position. If 12 nations are to make the most of their separate resources and talents, each must be ready to join in the search for agreement. But equally, I reject the argument that it is somehow bad form within the Community to fight for what we think right. The suggestion is occasionally made—it was made by some in this House during our struggle for better Community budget discipline—that the right course must always be to go along with the consensus. But that obviously depends whether the consensus is right—right for us and right for the Community. For us to fall in with the majority, where we think it charts the wrong path for the Community, would be to fail the Community, as well as Britain.

I make no apology—and the House would not expect anyone to make an apology—for the fact that the recent far-reaching review of the Community's finances and policies took place at the insistence of this country. The other member states now acknowledge, publicly and privately, just how necessary that review was. The new own resources decision and intergovernmental agreement now before the House are among its results: today's debate gives us an opportunity to review them all.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am normally fascinated by the points that are made by my hon. Friend. I hope that he will forgive me on this occasion, but I wish to stay within the pattern of the argument.

The principal result is a series of deep-seated changes in the way the Community budget will in future be run. The Community now has the solid foundation which it needs in the run-up to 1992. That demonstrates the wisdom of this Government's determination to make a success of the Community through concrete internal reform, consistently and tenaciously pursued, even when many in Brussels urged us to settle for less. Our tenacity in pursuit of those objectives is in sharp contrast to the ineffectual, toothless, gnawing attitude one sometimes detects from the Benches opposite, where vacillation has become accepted as a substitute for leadership and consistency, and resolution and patriotism are conspicuous by their absence.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No, but I am sure that I carry my hon. Friend with me in what I have just said about the Opposition.

The same contrast is evident in the attitudes of the two sides of the House to the completion of the single market. That is the next key task for the Community. It is another where the United Kingdom has set the pace, and the tone has been set by my right hon. and hon. Friends.

Good progress is being made. In the six months of the German presidency, agreement was reached at Council level on a record number of 56 individual single market measures. That brings the total since the Milan European Council in 1985 to nearly 200. Those key measures included a number of considerable importance to the United Kingdom, such as the removal of controls on capital movements by all member states. That is a prerequisite of a genuine free market in financial services. It will be a major boon to the City of London.

The measures included the full liberalisation of road haulage by the end of 1992. That means the end of continental lorry quotas. British firms will be able freely to compete for business, and costs to consumers will be cut. I mention as well the liberalisation of non-life insurance services—another change of major benefit to the British insurance industry.

Why has there been the acceleration of progress on the single market?

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): Lord Cockfield.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am almost delighted that the hon. Gentleman is paying tribute to a British member of the European Commission. Certainly he deserves tribute.

Mr. Holland rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have taken the hon. Gentleman's point.

We have made such rapid progress because, throughout the Community, there has been a growing recognition of the significance of 1992, and the benefits that it will bring, and because the completion of the future financing review, the principal reason for this Bill, has provided the foundation for single market success.

Mr. Budgen: No dialogue—just reading out the Foreign Office brief.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am delighted that my hon. Friend is taking such a close interest in what I have to say. He will find it even more fascinating, as I go on.

The accession of Spain and Portugal on 1 January 1986 brought the Community two new members with incomes significantly below the Community average. Their entry coincided with a strong and increasing awareness of the link between the single market programme and the Community's spending plans. In particular, it was clear that the full development of the single market would best be accompanied by further expansion of the structural funds, to improve the economic infrastructure of the poorer Community regions.

Thus, it became clear too that the ceiling on the Community's own resources agreed at Fontainebleau in 1984 would be insufficient to provide for the needs of a Community of 12 in the run-up to 1992. In consequence, the Commission brought forward, in February 1987, proposals for the comprehensive restructuring of the Community's finances and an increase in the level of the Community's own resources.

From the beginning, the future financing review provided both threats and opportunities. On the positive side, the Commission's proposals called for a comprehensive reform of the common agricultural policy. That included, for the first time, the introduction of automatic stabilisers in all the main agricultural sectors, with increased supervisory power for the Commission to prevent possible overshoots. The Commission also proposed improved budget management procedures. The aim here was to improve forward financial planning. To all that, the United Kingdom gave strong support.

But the Commission's proposals also contained dangers. Chief among them was a proposal for a new method of calculating the British abatement which, on our calculations, would have left the United Kingdom hundreds of millions of pounds worse off in each year up to 1992—and by about £700 million in 1992 alone.

The Commission also proposed an increase in the own resources of the Community to 1·4 per cent. of Community GNP. The United Kingdom argued that an increase of that scale—equivalent to a rise of nearly 50 per cent.—was not required, and would impose an unnecessary burden on taxpayers.

Another unwelcome Commission proposal was for a new tax on the consumption of oils and fats. That was designed to lay upon consumers the burden of the Community's oils and fats support regime—by increasing the costs of margarine and vegetable oils by up to 31 per cent. We strongly opposed that tax: it would have been degressive, and it would have done little to address the basic problem of over-production.

In the negotiations which followed, we made four points clear: first, any further increase in Community resources must be accompanied by effective and legally binding controls on expenditure; secondly, there would have to be effective measures to reduce agricultural surpluses; thirdly, there should be no oils and fats tax; and fourthly, we were determined to preserve in full the Fontainebleau abatement mechanism.

We also made it absolutely clear that we were not prepared to agree to any element of the future financing package until we were satisfied with every individual element in the package as a whole. We succeeded on all counts.

We succeeded in getting in place agricultural stabilisers for cereals, oil seeds and the other principal agricultural commodities. Those stabilisers have subsequently been implemented by a series of detailed agricultural regulations covering each of the crops involved. By the standards of Community agriculture in the previous two decades, that stabiliser regime is revolutionary and long overdue. For the first time, we have an automatic mechanism, with teeth, which will control the growth of financial support.

To improve overall control of the common agricultural policy, the Brussels European Council also agreed, again for the first time, to make the financial guideline for agricultural spending legally binding. In future, the Commission's price proposals must always be consistent with the agricultural guideline.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): In the catalogue of success that my right hon. and learned Friend is relaying about how well we are now controlling expenditure, why has he omitted the lack of legally binding controls on the non-obligatory sector? How are the intergovernmental discussions supposed to equate with the legally binding controls that we were promised by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister at the Dispatch Box?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As my hon. Friend has acknowledged, the arrangements now coming into force provide legally binding controls for obligatory expenditure under the agricultural guideline. They also provide for legally binding limits year on year on the aggregate Community budget. The combination of those two effects provides a legally binding control on the non-obligatory expenditure. In addition, the matter is fortified by the inter-institutional agreement that was also arrived at as part of the arrangements. The point made by my hon. Friend—[Interruption.] This is the point. Even the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) finds it difficult to follow the complexity of these matters. For that reason, the intervention made by my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken), confirms the wisdom of my original decision to allow a relatively small number of interventions. These are technical points, and we must look at the matter as a whole.

Mr. Marlow: Why is the package so complex?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: With his characteristic wisdom, even from a sedentary position my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) has asked, "Why such a complex package?" It is complex to satisfy the legitimate anxieties of my hon Friends to gain effective control in the circumstances.

In future, as I have said, spending on the CAP will be able to grow at a maximum of just three quarters of the rate of growth of Community GNP—that is, about 2 per cent. per annum in real terms. That compares with an average growth rate of 5 per cent. per annum over the years 1980-87. Crucially, it will ensure that the CAP has access to a steadily shrinking percentage of the Community's GNP.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No. I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me. No doubt the House is looking forward with great interest to what my hon Friend has to say.

The Brussels agreement also eliminated the general provision for additional expenditure in so-called "exceptional circumstances." Instead, the new budget discipline arrangements make specific and tightly controlled provision for a reserve of 1 billion ecu which will become available only in response to substantial in-year changes in the dollar-ecu exchange rate.

World agricultural prices are in dollar terms, so when the dollar falls against the ecu, CAP budget costs rise. When in future such extra costs exceed 400 million ecu, the new reserve will be triggered, and may be drawn down, but only up to the limit of 1 billion ecu. The arrangement is symmetrical: when the dollar rises, the reserve will fall, automatically reducing the amount available for CAP support.

In line with the provision in the Brussels conclusions that all these controls should be in legally binding form, detailed texts governing agricultural budget discipline, the financing of the CAP and of stock depreciation, and the financing of FEOGA intervention, have been drawn up since February. They were formally adopted by the Council on 24 June and copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

The conclusions of the February European Council also provided for a useful tightening of arrangements for budgetary mamagement. Those provisions too are embodied in a Council regulation adopted on 24 June and deposited in the Library of the House.

As I explained earlier in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South, a helpful additional control on spending arises from the agreement between the Council, the European Parliament and the Commission on an inter-institutional agreement covering Community expenditure between 1988 and 1992. Under the agreement, all three institutions commit themselves to respect a reference framework, or financial perspective, for spending over the five-year period which is consistent with the conclusions of the Brussels European Council.

So much for the framework. How are the new arrangements working in practice? The Commission's 1988 price-fixing proposals for support prices for agricultural products were within the agricultural guideline for 1988, as was the compromise package agreed by the Council on 23 and 24 June. The Commission's proposed provision for agriculture in the draft 1989 budget is within the guideline for 1989.

The signal to farmers and the markets is clear. The scandal of soaring CAP costs, at the expense of taxpayers, consumers and developing countries, is at last being brought under control.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To preserve his superb reputation for fairness and honesty, will my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State accept that on the basis of the information provided by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the 2 per cent. increase referred to in 1989 actually compares with a year of 14 months and that that 14-month year was created by the £5 billion overspend under the previous strict budgetary controls?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is important that my hon. Friend should give me the opportunity to deal with that matter. I heard him muttering about it, so I thought that I would give the House the opportunity to hear about it.

A change was made last year to alter the arrangements so that the financial control of agricultural expenditure shifted from the system of advances to reimbursements. Whereas previously money used to be advanced by the Community to member states for them to pay, it is now paid by way of reimbursing expenditure actually incurred. We regarded that change as desirable because it gives tighter control. Member states are given money when they have paid it out.

As a matter of practice in making the change, it involved reimbursing after a two-and-a-half-month delay. There was a change in the pattern of timing. If we compare the two years, we see that the figure for 1988 covers the period from 1 November 1987 to 15 October 1988. The second period for the 1989 figure covers 16 October 1988 to 15 October 1989. The two periods are comparable, and the 2 per cent. increase to which I have referred results from comparing like with like.

I am anxious to make that point. It answers the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) and no doubt he will have an opportunity to investigate it further. The House will understand that it is possible to make these points only with a high degree of comprehension, as characterised by the intervention made by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East.

The change to which I have referred is already having a powerful effect in practice. In the dairy sector, as many hon. Members will be aware from their experience, where milk quotas were first introduced in 1984 and strengthened under our presidency in 1986, the reduction of intervention stocks has already been impressive. Between the end of April 1987 and the end of April this year, butter stocks in the Community have been reduced from some 1·1 million tonnes to about 570,000 tonnes. That is a reduction of almost 50 per cent. in 12 months. Similarly, stocks of skimmed milk powder were reduced from 766,000 tonnes at the end of April last year to just 101,000 tonnes at the end of April this year. That is an 87 per cent. reduction.

All those important agricultural reforms have been achieved without the introduction of the oils and fats tax, despite strong support for such a tax from a number of member states.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman implying that this is the first time that there has been a sharp reduction in the level of butter and skimmed milk stocks, or does he recall that a similar reduction took place in 1982 without such a scheme?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: This is the first time that one has been deliberately sought in the face of market conditions that might have produced the opposite result. It has been achieved as a result of the determination with which the Government have sought this precise reform in agricultural policy. One of the most notable contributions was made by my right hon. Friend the then Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, when presiding over the December 1986 Farm Council, who brought to bear on the working of the Community all the authority that came from his experience as a Government Chief Whip and achieved a good result.

I see this willingness to accept the reform of the common agricultural policy agreed at Brussels as an impressive demonstration of the new seriousness of purpose in the Community. However, it will have to be sustained and intensified for years to come. More, much more, must still be done to make the agricultural sector worldwide more responsive to market signals. The opportunity arises in the current GATT negotiations.

Almost every one of the industrial economies needs to discover ways of promoting the health of their rural communities that do not depend upon the artificially protected production of food surpluses. That need was recognised at the Toronto economic summit. The message that the Toronto summit gave the GATT negotiators in Geneva was clear and can be put simply and graphically: that, if the countryside is to find a different way of maintaining its economic health, we should "start beating ploughshares into golf clubs". [Interruption.] Well, it is a striking phrase which should appeal to the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), as it has a great appeal in Scotland.

It is a serious point, because for too long we have been devoting resources, not just in Britain or in the Community but throughout the world, to supporting, sustaining and protecting agriculture to enable it to produce food surpluses that cannot be consumed, at prices that are artificially sustained. The task of reform is the message that we have been driving home at the Tokyo, Venice and Toronto summits. That task must be dramatised and we must look for other ways of sustaining our rural communities. I make no apology for the phrase. Yes, let us start beating ploughshares into golf clubs. Planning permission is part of the argument.

We want action soon, and, over and above that, we want an agreed framework for major cuts in protection and support in the longer term as well in the short run. Through the Community, Britain will be working—

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) rose——

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Will my hon. and learned Friend give way?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: If my hon. Friends will forgive me, I shall not give way; I have given way sufficiently already.

Through the Community, we shall be working to ensure that the GATT negotiations reach a successful conclusion.

Mr. Oppenheim rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall give way for the last time.

Mr. Oppenheim: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for giving way. I know that he is greatly concerned to free the agricultural market, and as moves seem to be in hand to do just that, is it not also true that the Commission is taking an increasingly protectionist stand on the import of non-EEC industrial goods? At the moment, the EEC has a series of quotas, voluntary restraint agreements and spurious anti-dumping duties against a range of goods from steel to typewriters, and from photocopiers to canned mushrooms in brine. How can that help the industries which use those products, and how does it square with the Government's policy of deregulation and freeing the markets?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That intervention may have to substitute for my hon. Friend's speech, although I hope not. It raises a range of question. As my hon. Friend knows, the fact is that on almost every commodity for which there is an argument for anti-dumping regulations and protectionism, more often than not a United Kingdom constituency is arguing for such protection. It is important that the right balance is struck. On the whole, and certainly as far as the United Kingdom is concerned, our pressure is constantly for more liberalisation. I take as an example the removal of quotas in the steel industry, an arrangement which was operated to the advantage of the Community steel industry as a whole for some years, but which we wanted to get rid of, and we have got rid of it, pressing the Community in a more liberal direction.

The conclusions of the Hanover Council clearly record that we want to be sure that the achievement of the single market does not amount to the erection of a new protective hedge around the Community. It is important that we should continue to work as we are doing to achieve more liberalisation of the countries of the European Free Trade Association. However, it is equally important that we should not give away a protection if we could use it to win a corresponding deal from another trading bloc. The matter should be handled intelligently. My hon. Friend's point was worth making, and will be taken on board.

As I mentioned earlier, a further important element of the review of future financing was the adoption by the Council again on 24 June, of a new regulation on the structural funds, putting into effect the decision of the Brussels Council to increase structural funds commitments by some £1 billion a year over the period 1989-92.

The increase will go primarily to the poorest, to Greece, Portugal, Spain, Italy and Ireland, but Britain will remain a major beneficiary from the funds. We shall continue to receive more than £750 million a year——

Mr. Redwood rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No, if my hon. Friend will forgive me, I will not give way.

The particular problems of Northern Ireland will continue to receive special attention. Areas affected by industrial decline will still benefit from the regional and the social funds. Social fund resources will still be available to tackle unemployment, especially youth and long-term unemployment. The Highlands and Islands, mid-Wales and Devon and Cornwall will continue to qualify for support from all three structural funds.

The final element in the Brussels Council package was the agreement to increase the level of own resouces available to the Community, and to change the way in which member states' contributions were calculated.

The new own resources decision, the implementation of which is provided for by clause 1, gives effect to the February decision to increase the overall limit on the amount of resources available to the Community.

As I have explained, some increase was inevitable, and always foreseen as likely, given the terms of the Fontainebleau agreement, the accession of Spain and Portugal and the increase in the structural funds required in the context of 1992. The new limit has been set this year at 1·15 per cent. of Community GNP. It will rise through a series of annual sub-ceilings to 1·2 per cent. in 1992. The original Commission proposal, strongly supported by a number of member states, was, of course, for 1·4 per cent.

The new own resources decision also embodies a change in the structure of the Community's own resources. Under the new arrangements, the VAT rate will continue to be limited to 1·4 per cent., but the VAT base in each member state will be capped at 55 per cent. of its GNP. The remaining portion of resources due from each member state will be calculated according to its share in Community GNP. The Council has agreed a directive—a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House —to ensure that member states' GNP statistics are comparable and uniform. Calculating an element of member states' contributions on the basis of GNP will bring the own resources structure more in line with the relative prosperity of member states—another change which the United Kingdom has consistently supported.

Most important of all, the new own resources decision preserves the Fontainebleau abatement mechanism intact. Some member states initially argued that it should be abolished outright. Others wanted to see it greatly reduced, or made degressive so as to disappear by 1992. However, in the end all accepted that it should continue. The Fontainebleau arrangement has been worth some £3,000 million to Britain over the past three years. It will be worth some £1,600 million this year. It ensures that, even if Community spending were to reach the new ceiling, the United Kingdom net contribution could amount to no more than about 0·25 per cent. of GNP.

The abatement mechanism will last as long as the new own resources decision itself, and even thereafter can be changed only by the unanimous agreement of all member states. The Commission's document setting out how the abatement will be calculated in future has been deposited in the Library.

The Bill also seeks the approval of the House for payments to be made under the 1988 intergovernmental agreement. This is needed to ensure that the Community can meet its commitments during the rest of this year, pending the entry into force of the new own resources decision. The procedure of using a single Bill for the new own resources decision and the intergovernmental agreement was expressly commended by the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee in its report of 18 May, and follows the precedent of the 1985 European Communities (Finance) Act. The present Bill supersedes and repeals that Act.

Throughout this spring, we made it clear that we would not be prepared to recommend to this House an increase in Community own resources until all the decisions reached at the Brussels European Council had been embodied in firm and legally binding texts. With the adoption of the package of texts by the Council on 24 June, that stage has been reached.

Effective CAP reform is at last in train. The Community's finances are at last firmly based. On this foundation the single market can be, and is being, successfully built. Three key United Kingdom aims are thus achieved or under way. The Community's interests are also being enhanced. To set our sights high was right —for Britain and for the Community. We have hit the target, and I commend the Bill to the House.

5.10 pm

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): I beg to move, to leave out from "That" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof,

"this House declines to give a Second Reading to a Bill which fails to provide a genuine and expeditious programme for a substantial reduction in common agricultural spending or a corresponding increase in budget allocations for the social and regional funds, for the environment or for assistance to developing countries."

One is tempted to start this debate by saying that it is the same old debate with the same old characters at the same old time, only the figures are bigger.

Mr. Forth: And the hon. Gentleman will make the same old speech.

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman says that I shall make the same old speech. I hope that he has taken the precaution of looking at my 1985 speech and comparing it with what the Foreign Secretary said then.

There is a major difference today. It is not just that the figures are much larger than they have ever been, but there is the presence of the Foreign Secretary to open the debate. That is surprising because this is not his Bill, but a Bill presented by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer. Where is he? Nowhere to be seen. He is not present to defend or even to describe the Bill. That has been left to the man whose job the Chancellor is said to covet even more than a level of interest rates which may stay steady for more than 10 days at a time.

That is all the more surprising since the Treasury has its own European Minister who could have launched the Government's flag ship today. The Paymaster General is present, giving a serious imitation of being awake, which is more than several of his hon. Friends have managed during the Foreign Secretary's speech. The Paymaster General is usually cast adrift on the parliamentary ocean at the mercy of all the sharks on both sides of the House. But he is no mean figure to sail this particular dead fish, if one is to continue with these nautical analogies. He is not a minor Treasury Minister; in his spare, unpaid, time he is the chairman of the Conservative and Unionist party. Who better to tell us of the iniquities of today's creative accountancy which will allow the Common Market once again to escape bankruptcy?

After all, the right hon. Gentleman was appointed to eliminate the charismatic mark of the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), who won the election but lost the Prime Minister's ear for being too explicit in saying aloud what she allows only to be unattributably leaked. Even in her most demented moments she could not have appointed the Paymaster General to do for the Conservative party what he managed to do for the European Community. For all that, the Paymaster General has the clout and the prestige to launch the Bill, but he is not doing it.

Mr. Forth: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robertson: No.

Instead, it is the Foreign Secretary, who on 30 June opened a full day's foreign affairs debate. Today he is here to open the debate on this important Bill which has been stolen from the Treasury, and on Friday he is back at the Dispatch Box opening a full day's debate on Hong Kong. I put it to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, that three opening speeches in two weeks would make even the most sleepy Lobby journalist stop suspiciously for a moment. After weeks of speculation——

Mr. Forth rose——

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne) rose——

Mr. Robertson: I shall consider giving way to hon. Gentlemen who are jumping up and down when I come to an appropriate point in my speech.

We have seen weeks of speculation. On 28 June The Sun, among the usual abuse of the Labour party which we have come to expect, had an editorial headlined, "Bye, Geoffrey", which stated:

"In a speech Sir Geoffrey Howe claimed credit for Britain's economic success.

But what he was really doing was fighting for his political life.

Too late, Geoffrey. You would have done better if, instead of siding with Nigel Lawson in the row over the pound, you had supported your Prime Minister.

Now all you can do is wait until October 17 when you're due for the chop."

Clearly, The Sun knows more than even the right hon. and learned Gentleman about how he will go and the precise date on which it will happen.

Perhaps the Foreign Secretary has spotted a chink in the door at No. 11 Downing street, with the fourth interest hike in two weeks allowing a previous Chancellor a brief moment at the Dispatch Box to show up in public the present incumbent——

[Mr. Robertson]

Mr. Gow: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. When the Opposition Front Bench spokesman makes an opening speech on the Second Reading of a Bill should not the spokesman direct his mind and words to the Bill rather than to outrageous attacks upon my right hon. and learned Friend?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): The hon. Gentleman will realise that a Second Reading debate is wide-ranging and hon. Members should be allowed to develop their comments as they see fit.

Mr. Robertson: It is indicative of the embarrassment of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen that they have to stoop to such a weak debating point to interrupt a speech. The House is now graced with a predecessor of the Paymaster General, who is sitting on the Back Benches, having fallen out with the Prime Minister, as have so many sitting around him. He was in the position of making up all the fanciful tales about European Community budgets which were told to the House.

My point is that this is a Treasury Bill and the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs is moving it. It is legitimate for the House to ask why that is and where on earth the Chancellor of the Exchequer is during this debate on his Bill.

It is difficult to explain the Foreign Secretary's completely irrational desire to open the debate on this of all Bills, which provides so little evidence of judgment, efficiency and political or financial prudence. Is the truth that he was left with the short straw yet again because even the Chancellor, who has peddled a few secondhand policies in his time, could not face selling this particular old banger? One can see why anybody, boasting, however fraudulently, of national financial success, would want to keep far from this Bill.

The Foreign Secretary has tried his best to confuse because, obviously, he cannot convince the House that when the bluster, jargon and funny money is set aside, the news in the Bill is not bad for Parliament and for British taxpayers.

Mr. Forth rose——

Mr. Redwood rose——

Mr. Robertson: When we strip away the inter-institutional agreements, the intergovernmental agreements, the non-refundable advances, the fourth resources, the stabilisers, the green pound, the social spaces, the financial engineering and all the Euro mumbo-jumbo, the Bill permits a dramatic increase in the Common Market's budget of 25 per cent. on what it spends now. That is one extra pound for every four that the Community is spending.

Last year, after getting everything back that we were due and after receiving the much-vaunted rebate that the Government are so proud of, Britain paid a total of £1,347 million to the Community—that was our total net contribution. For those who struggle to understand these concepts, that is the equivalent of the total amount that the Government spent on the National Health Service's capital investment programme last year.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the figure has since been revised yet again, for the fifth time? The net contribution last year was £1,649 million. There has been a further revision—the revisions occur regularly. That, of course, is an enormous figure.

Mr. Robertson: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. At least one expatriate Scot who got away from the fragile and dangerous areas for Tories north of the border makes a constructive contribution. We are now talking about considerably more than what the Government spent on the NHS's capital investment programme last year. As a consequence of the Prime Minister's negotiations and generosity at the Brussels summit, the figure is expected to go up by between £200 million and £300 million, which is the equivalent of the total arts budget of this country. That will be the extra amount paid to the European Community this year.

Mr. Budgen: Will the hon. Gentleman comment on the increase in the structural funds? We have been helped very much by a document from Conservative Central Office, which tells us some of the things that the Foreign Office is not prepared to draw attention to. It points out that the structural funds will go up by 80 per cent. in real terms. I dare say that the hon. Gentleman, who I expect believes in plenty of industrial and social engineering, will applaud that, and he might even provide us with Tory arguments for the increases. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary did not have anything to say about the 80 per cent. increase in real terms.

Mr. Robertson: I know that the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not. That is why I shall come to that. The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. I presume that the briefing that he mentions is issued under the name of the Paymaster General. I am sure that when he winds up the debate the right hon. Gentleman will be pleased to give careful attention to the material that is coming from his own researchers, buried deep in the bowels of Conservative Central Office.

I am giving equivalents of the large sums because such large amounts are almost meaningless. They seem meaningless to the Prime Minister because she agrees to them with such aclarity—[HON. MEMBERS: "Alacrity."] I am sorry. The Euro-jargon is even getting to me.

In the context of those remarkable increases, I should like to draw attention to an exchange in the Select Committee on Treasury and Civil Service, to which I pay fulsome tribute for producing, yet again, an excellent report on the subject. The exchange was between the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) and Mr. A. J. C. Edwards, under-secretary to the European Community Group in the Treasury.

The hon. Member for Bridlington asked:

"I just wonder what would be the attitude of the Treasury if one of the spending departments came up with a request to increase spending by 25 per cent."

Mr. Edwards replied—these are precious words—

"Well, it is no secret that we would not be well pleased."

The language of Sir Humphrey permeates all this. I recently heard a Minister say at a public gathering that if people thought that "Yes, Minister" was a comedy, he was able to vouch for the fact that it was a documentary. There is ultimate proof in that quotation.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): My hon. Friend quoted from the explanatory and financial memorandum to the Bill, which says that the net increase in expenditure will be between £200 million and £300 million a year. Does he not agree that that is an estimate, which takes account of what the Government hope will be spent in Britain at Brussels' behest? Would it not be more accurate to say what the extra liability would be? Should not the Paymaster General tell us that? Despite that being the former job of the Foreign Secretary, he did not have the grace to tell us what the liability is.

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. To spare the House the complete tangle of statistics, I left out that substantial point for the moment. As the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) said, the structural funds will play a large part in the net calculation that will apply to this country next year. I intend to deal with that and to show that the optimistic assumptions of the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary have little or no chance of coming to fruition. Therefore, the £200 million to £300 million extra that we shall pay to the Community will be substantially below the amount that we shall get. Indeed, we shall pay far more than that.

The recalculation of the budget financing on a GNP basis is welcome, being fair and much more straightforward than the previous convoluted system, but it is being used simply as a cover for the 20 to 25 per cent. increase in the Community budget that is now proposed. We remain rightly sceptical of the calculation of GNP that will apply in many Community countries, not least our own, but those figures are not the only bad news with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not want to be associated.

The second and entirely separate part of the Bill puts the Chancellor's signature on a splendidly generous cheque from the Treasury to the European Community, even more generous than the cheque that the Minister for Social Security and the Disabled handed over to ITV's Telethon at prime time only a few weeks ago. That cheque to the Common Market will be for no less than £765 million. It is the intergovernmental agreement sum that we shall pay as an extra amount to the European Community this year.

It is difficult to find equivalents to show how generous the Government are and how much they have given away, but if I say that the combination of that payment plus the extra payment that we shall give the Community will probably be close to the total spent on the roads programme in the whole of the United Kingdom, perhaps some people will get the gist of what has been conceded.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robertson : No.

It should be noted that this year we intend to give close to £2 billion as our contribution to the European Community. That extra-generous cheque, which will go under the title of an intergovernmental agreement yet again, a non-refundable advance on our contribution, will add up to 57 per cent. of our net contribution. That special, one-off payment will add up to 57 per cent. on top of our present bill for membership of the Common Market. It is small wonder that the Chancellor of the Exchequer stayed away today. Even he does not have the brass neck or the cheek to tell us how prudent or sensible that amount is.

The expensive saga is still not over because what follows is even more reason for the Chancellor to keep out of the firing line and let the Foreign Secretary take the shellfire, perhaps all the better to benefit the Chancellor in his desire to take over his predecessor's job.

What do those gigantic sums mean for Britain? What does the deal that was wearily accepted by the Prime Minister in the wee small hours in Brussels in February do for our country or even for the European Community? I come back to the point made by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West. For one thing, it will double the structural funds of the European Community—the European social and regional funds. Before she went to Brussels, the Prime Minister said that such an increase would be lacking in any "rational justification".

In the House of Lords, Lord Brabazon of Tara said:

"The proposal by the Commission for a doubling of the structural funds is in our opinion quite unrealistic". —[Official Report, House of Lords, 9 November 1987; Vol. 489, c. 1243.]

Of course, he simply reads a script written by the Treasury, because in May the Paymaster General told the House that such a figure was "wholly unrealistic." The structural funds will not go up by 50 per cent., but by 1992, they will go up by 80 per cent., with good reason, of course.

The House of Lords Select Committee on the European Community recently published a report "Reform of the Structural Funds" which says:

"Differences in unemployment rates have intensified throughout the Community. Comparing the Community with the USA, it"— the Commission—

"estimates that regional disparities in the Community are twice as high as regards incomes, and three times as high as regards unemployment rates."

Mr. Budgen: What proportion of the structural funds are obligatory and what non-obligatory? I believe that almost all of them are non-obligatory and if so, they are not subject to any legally binding constraints.

Mr. Robertson: The bulk of the structural funds are non-obligatory, but in order to reduce the amount of money in the compulsory and agricultural sector next year, the Community has transferred some of that money to the non-obligatory sector and is now claiming a triumph in reducing the agricultural component of the 1989 budget. The accountants employed by the European Community beat anyone employed by any local government organisation in Britain.

When the Prime Minister returned from Brussels she had no regrets about her volte-face on the structural funds but said:

"We receive about £750 million from the structural funds."

The Foreign Secretary repeated that this afternoon. However, she went on to say:

"Indeed we do fairly well out of the funds. We hope"—

note the word "hope"—

"that this figure will increase to about £1,000 million in 1992." —[Official Report, 15 February 1988; Vol. 127, c. 710.]

[Mr. Robertson]

The division of the structural funds is being negotiated presently and one thing is clear—Britain will not do well, whatever the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary may say.

In the 1989 draft budget, 80 per cent. of the social and regional funds will be devoted to what is entitled "Objective I areas". Most of those areas are in Spain and Portugal and only one United Kingdom area, Northern Ireland, is featured. That area alone will benefit from the lion's share of the new cash that will be poured into the structural funds. Therefore, many suffering British regions and many of our acutely disadvantaged communities will be off the European assistance map for years. The Prime Minister may "hope", but our regions will suffer from her unwillingness to bargain. Her redrawing of the British regional assistance map has kept us out of the reckoning. When the intergovernmental agreement contained in the Bill is endorsed, our only real bargaining lever for a fairer deal on the structural funds will go for many years to come.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber) rose——

Mr. Robertson: I have given way enough and I would like to leave time for others to speak in this important debate.

We are told that the next benefit in Santa Howe's package is the cut in the near-obscene expenditure on agriculture. Anyone who thinks that this much vaunted package will stop the unique protection from market pressures and currency fluctuations that is given to farmers and farming—a protection that is not given to any other industry or work force—will, predictably, be sadly disappointed.

We are assured that there are to be new legally binding controls on agricultural spending. The fatal flaws in 1984 Fontainebleau package about which we and other Members of the House repeatedly warned the Government, have been supposedly spotted and eliminated. This time we are told that it is all watertight.

Certain hon. Members have asked, "What about 1984?" Let me take the Foreign Secretary back to 25 June 1985 when we considered the European Communities (Finance) Bill of that year. In reply to an intervention by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West and describing the great momentous controls that had been negotiated, the Foreign Secretary said:

"If that does not amount to the effective imposition of budget discipline, I do not know what does . . . We have achieved the fundamental change in the operation of the Community"—[Official Report, 25 June 1985; Vol. 81, c. 798-800.]

The then Economic Secretary to the Treasury went beyond that and he wrote an article in The Times that appeared on that very day. Of course, the Economic Secretary is now dealing with defence and great issues of the nation's security. I met him today on his way to Washington and he expressed a great desire to be in Washington and not in the House this evening. In that article, he said:

"we achieved a system of budgetary discipline designed to bring the growth of Community expenditure under much tighter control . . . we see that the new budgetary disciplines are now beginning to bite . . . Fontainebleau has changed the rules for good."

That is not what the Foreign Secretary said today, rather that Fontainebleau was rubbish. It is like Gorbachev at the all-party union conference a couple of weeks ago when he said that everything in the past was wrong, but that everything that he says now is 100 per cent. correct. Out of modesty I will not read out large chunks of my speech on 25 June when I predicted precisely the fatal flaws that the Foreign Secretary is now willing to admit in his confession today.

We have been told that all the loopholes have been closed—we hope so. I do not believe that anyone in this House does not hope that the controls will work and that the Community will get on with tackling the necessary and urgent problems that face all European countries. However, the House should be as sceptical about those controls as the fifth report of the Select Committee on the Treasury.

The excellent House of Commons Library reference sheet, which has been produced on this Bill, states:

"A more likely scenario is that violation of guidelines by the Commission might be renewed pressure from some member states, already unenthusiastic about budgetary discipline, to change the rules themselves. This would require unanimous agreement; but so of course have the successively more expensive budgetary packages agreed up until now."

That says it all.

In his evidence to the Select Committee, the Paymaster General underlined the concept of legal enforceability by reminding the Committee that, on behalf of the British Government, he took the European Parliament to the European Court of Justice when that Parliament broke the treaty provisions on legal spending limits. He told the Committee that we won the judgment, but he conveniently forgot to remind the Committee that we had to pay the substantial cost involved in fighting that action and that the eventually agreed budget was larger than the one which he had taken the European Parliament to court to stop. If those are the guarantees on the legal enforceability of this budget, we and the Committee are right to be sceptical and suspicious about the controls—all the more so when they apply to the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield) rose——

Mr. Robertson: Time does not allow me to give way.

The Foreign Secretary is aware that, on the crucial cereals threshold, the Prime Minister was forced to accept what she knew to be a ludicrously generous stabiliser of 160 million tonnes. Before she attended that summit, she had said that that level would be "an attack on the taxpayer and the housewife"

The Foreign Secretary is aware that the accumulating price cuts with which the Prime Minister dazzled the House in February do not start until the year after the stabiliser limits have been exceeded. At the same time, the right hon. Lady's Government, without using the negotiating power that they had over the IGA to get a fair deal for these extra structural funds, have thrown a bonus of £750 million into the expenditure hole of the 1988 budget, the budget which the Prime Minister has despised.

If the Foreign Secretary was trying today to get back into the limelight, to get back into the reckoning for succession to the Prime Minister, or even to survive the knives of the autumn, he chose a bad cause to plead and a bad case to present to the House. Four years and two weeks have passed since we debated the Bill which followed the Fontainebleau summit, yet we are still offered only hopes and promises on the financing of the Community.

The Government and the Prime Minister see no vision of a Europe that works for all its citizens, including the young, the unemployed and those whose jobs are threatened by Japanese or United States competition, who could all benefit from genuine pan-European programmes. Instead, the Prime Minister sees a deregulated, free-for-all Europe that is made easy for big business. This sad financial Bill says it all about Thatcherism at home and abroad—prudence for those who need help and profligacy for those who already have the cash.

5.42 pm

Mr. Terence L. Higgins (Worthing): The extremely long preamble and peroration of the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), in which he complained that it was my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary who proposed the Bill's Second Reading and not my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, might have been more convincing had the hon. Gentleman been the shadow Chancellor.

It is rather difficult to regard the increase in own resources that we are debating as more than a further step on the rake's progress which the EEC has developed over the years. We must recognise, however, that the Government have been making strenuous efforts to bring matters under control. The progress that they have made with the United Kingdom abatement is to be welcomed.

It is fundamental to the Government's policy that own resources should not be increased unless there is effective budgetary discipline. Developments on that front have been chronicled over a period by the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service. On budgetary discipline, I fear that it is no consolation to any member of that Committee to say, "I told you so." The matter was made clear to the Government by that Committee at the time of the Fontainebleau agreement. That is something which none of us can rejoice about.

We must recognise that it is extremely difficult for a Head of Government, as a lone voice, to continue saying no time and time again. It is important to view the developments that we are debating today against that extremely difficult background.

I wish, first, to comment on a major change in the basis of our contribution to own resources from VAT to gross national product. The Select Committee on the Treasury and the Civil Service, in the final paragraph of its report, draws attention to the real dangers that accompany that, especially the GNP statistics. The Committee observes that the United Kingdom's GNP statistics are deficient. I am glad that the Treasury has agreed about that and has introduced a review that will, I hope, result in more accurate statistics. These statistics are used in governing the country and in organising the economy, and when it comes to our contribution to the EEC they mean hard cash.

I was disappointed by the way in which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister answered a question which I put to her following her statement on returning from the Hanover summit. I asked my right hon. Friend to check that our own GNP statistics were all right and similarly to check those for the rest of the Community. My right hon. Friend said:

"I agree with my right hon. Friend that a change from a percentage of VAT to a percentage of GNP is significant . . . Obviously, I cannot force the rest of the European Community to do that"— that is, to initiate an inquiry—

"but we are making strenuous efforts to see that our statistics are as accurate as we can make them."—[Official Report, 30 June 1988; Vol. 136, c. 528.]

It is crucial that the review should encompass our own statistics and those of the other member states. If it does not, we may find ourselves paying more to the EEC than we should. I hope that the Treasury will take this matter on board and that we shall have more forthcoming answers in future than the one which I received to my question.

Mr. Spearing: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Higgins: I shall give way only once. Complaints have been made that Privy Councillors speak for too long, and I am anxious not to do that.

Mr. Spearing: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman's remarks are illustrative of a scrutiny problem. Is he aware that the Government have produced an explanatory memorandum and that the EEC has produced a Commission working paper on GNP? If we read the titles of the documents that are italicised in the Official Report for Thursday 7 July, which the Leader of the House did not repeat, we find that they are notionally for debate today. I do not blame the right hon. Gentleman, because there is a great scrutiny problem.

Mr. Higgins: I agree that scrutiny is tremendously important, and I pay tribute to the work of the Select Committee on European Legislation, which the hon. Gentleman heads, in that area. So many directives are being rushed through in anticipation of 1992, and this happens during any presidency of the Council. It is increasingly difficult for the House to ascertain what the directives really mean. It is a problem to which the House should give careful attention. I much agree with what the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) has said.

Should budgetary discipline be legally binding? We know that the Prime Minister was disappointed, rightly, that what she believed would be effective budgetary discipline at the time of the Fontainebleau agreement was not. She then said that it must be legally binding. I do not think that the House and the Government are making sufficient use of the legal restraints available to them in controlling those matters, while complying, rightly, with the legal restraints that are imposed on us.

A few days ago, we had to go along with the European Court's decision on imposing value added tax on certain items. It is difficult to understand why we do not insist on imposing legal restraints on matters such as expenditure in the EEC. We have had successive debates on the reports of the Court of Auditors in the EEC, which have said that various devices used to expand the expenditure in the EEC, beyond the limits that were thought right, were illegal. However, the Council of Ministers, the Commission and the EEC as a whole have not pointed out that, if this is illegal, it should not happen. I do not like the asymmetrical way in which, on the one hand, we are complying with our legal obligations but, on the other, we are not using the legal mechanisms to ensure that the EEC stays within the legal limits that have been imposed on it.

Will the agreement embodied in the Bill result in effective budgetary discipline? In that respect it is important to distinguish between non-obligatory and obligatory expenditure and to ascertain whether the present arrangements provide an effective means of legal control. When giving evidence to the Select Committee, my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General said:

"There will be a legal instrument. To take you back to the debate we have had in this committee room on previous occasions, we have previously not had legally enforceable instruments. Member States or the Council have recourse to the European Court if a legally enforceable instrument is in fact being infringed."

When the Prime Minister originally said that we would agree to an increase in own resources only if there was a legally enforceable instrument, I do not recall that a distinction was made between obligatory and non-obligatory expenditure. The impression created was that it would apply to both.

I shall deal with obligatory expenditure first. The agreement that we have reached imposes an arrangement whereby limits will be set on obligatory expenditure. But if the limits are exceeded in any given year, there will be a clawback over the next two years—most of it, we hope, in the following year. I understand that, but it is not a very prompt means of securing budgetary discipline.

What is more worrying is that paragraph 8 of the guidelines submitted for a decision of the European Council that dealt with this legally binding arrangement says:

"The budgetary effect of such exceptional circumstances shall be cancelled out within a three year period. If any overruns have not been offset by the end of the period, the Commission and the Council shall assess the situation and decide how to deal with the overrun."

That does not seem to be an effective way of imposing a legally binding agreement. I hope that when the Paymaster General replies, he will make it absolutely clear how this mechanism will work, so that if there is an excess, it will be possible for any Government to take the EEC and the relevant authorities to the Court.

I move from the obligatory expenditure side, which appears to be a little loosely worded, to non-obligatory expenditure. The Select Committee was told that it was not possible to make a legally binding agreement because "it would fetter the powers which the institutions enjoy under the terms of the budgetary articles of the Treaty."

If I understand it correctly, this is effectively an amendment to the treaty. I am not the least bit clear why we could not amend the treaty in such a way as not to affect those bodies said to have powers that would be fettered if we were to have a legally binding agreement on non-obligatory expenditure.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary said that we need not worry about the lack of a legally binding agreement on non-obligatory expenditure, because there is a limit on obligatory expenditure and a limit on the total. Therefore, effectively there is a legal limit on the lot. Will the Paymaster General concentrate on that point in his reply?

Mr. Holland: Wake him up.

Mr. Higgins: I know that he is giving careful attention to it. I do not understand how the mechanism described by the Foreign Secretary will work in practice. One problem is that there are considerable doubts about the way in which it will work and how it will be made legally binding.

The increase in own resources is substantial. The limit on agricultural expenditure will only keep it in line with the increase in GNP—in contrast with earlier attempts to reduce the percentage spent on agriculture. That is worrying. However, some progress has been made in this direction and I hope that the Paymaster General will deal with those points in his reply.

It is worrying that the periods specified for the restraints on expenditure are too long. There is a limit for a particular year and any excess is clawed back in the next year or the year after that. We should try to monitor it quarter by quarter. I hope that, in reply to this debate or in Committee, the Paymaster General will assure us that the figures will be produced each quarter, so that the Select Committee can ensure that the restraints are working within a year and, if necessary, report back to the House. Corrective action can then be taken before the annual limit is exceeded.

The Bill contains some improvements. It is certainly an improvement on the Fontainebleau agreement, but, as the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) said, we should continue to impose as tight a scrutiny as we can on the way in which the somewhat complex and nebulous proposals are put before us.

5.58 pm

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): In fending off questions at the beginning of his speech, the Foreign Secretary said that we had only a half-day debate, because the statement had reduced the time available. He added:

"I make no complaint about that."

I suggest that he should have complained to his business managers who had allocated only a half day when, as can be seen from the number of hon. Members in the Chamber——

Mr. George Robertson: It is not a half day, it is a whole day.

Sir Russell Johnston: Then I can be somewhat more relaxed. I had it firmly in my mind that it was only a half-day debate, so I withdraw unhesitatingly my first remarks.

I welcome the Bill. It represents an important step forward in the slow but steady integration of the European Community and the development of stable financial arrangements within it. It is very much in line with the views that I and other of my right hon. and hon. Friends have expressed from this Bench over many years. In his opening speech, the Foreign Secretary referred to the virtues of consistency and their alleged absence from the Opposition Front Bench. Be that as it may, I can claim with justice and no exaggeration that Liberals have been consistent and clear on these matters since the war.

Looking back to the successful Brussels summit in February, the fact is that, when faced with the choice of either jeopardising the achievement of the common internal market or agreeing to a modest and sensible increase in the Community's own resources, the Prime Minister chose the latter. That is fair enough, but I wonder why she was not prepared to endorse what was substantially the same agreement when it was first discussed in Copenhagen at the end of last year. The reality is that the Prime Minister's tactics held back the development of the Community by two to three months, for no reason and to nobody's benefit.

I must mention two related points. First, there is the continuing mystery of why Her Majesty's Government will not join the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system when it is known that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Treasury, the Foreign Secretary and most business men—most of whom support the Government—are in favour of it. Yet we continue to say that now is not the appropriate time.

Secondly, there is the mystery of the Prime Minister's attitude to the central European bank proposition. It seems to me that that is a very natural proposition on the road to European integration, that it will certainly come to pass in time and that it will be of great benefit to all the members of the Community. Nobody was asking the Prime Minister to commit herself in advance to any specific plan. All that she was required to do was to keep an open mind and to consider the potential benefits to Britain and to the Community as a whole. This, regrettably, she did not do. She made a sweeping attack on the whole idea, saying that it was absurd and ridiculous and that it should not be entertained because it would mean casting away sovereignty.

Perhaps the right hon. Lady had not read the July issue of Expression, which is published by American Express. It contains an article by the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the right hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker), in which she said:

"A truly liberal banking system throughout Europe would help—as would greater private use of the ecu."

I am sure that the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) would welcome greater private use of the ecu. The Minister continued:

"These are both things that we"—

that is, the Government—

"are encouraging in the move towards a single market."

There is a conflict between that clear position and the Prime Minister's equally clear position. The members of the Community have committed themselves to the free flow of capital within the European Community by 1990 and this is likely to be of major benefit to the United Kingdom, but the absence of a common bank and a common currency could produce large swings in interest rates as Governments tried to avoid harmful fluctuations in the value of their currencies.

Furthermore, from the point of view of the ordinary individual, the sheer cost and bother of changing money will cause more and more irritation as the single market develops. When my middle son, David, went on a school trip to Italy at the beginning of this year, I thought that he ought to have a few lire with him in case he had trouble changing money. I trotted off with my £10 note to the National Westminster Bank's bureau de change, where I was told, "We do not have any lire." Then I went to Barclay's bank where I was told, "We will change it, of course, but it will cost 70p. Are you a member of our bank?" When I said that I was not, I was told that it would cost me another £1. It cost me £1·70, not to buy anything but to change £10. That was immensely annoying. The Prime Minister's original dismissal of even discussions about a central bank was nothing short of ridiculous, and it bolstered Frankfurt's claim to house such an institution when it is established.

An unspoken side of the consequences of the Bill concerns democracy. I do not think that the Foreign Secretary was at the Hague conference earlier this year. He was represented by his right hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey. Perhaps she told him of the remarkable speech by the President of the Federal Republic of Germany, Richard von Weizsäcker, who said:

"Europe needs democracy. The democratic process exists on a national level and direct elections to the European Parliament represent a significant step towards a European supra-national democracy, but we must go further in this direction. A European Union which aims to protect democratic values in the world can no longer be satisfied with a parliament whose powers are inadequate. As long as the road to Europe is bound up with a loss of parliamentary power there will be no progress, because our European aim is democracy and that means it is bound up with parliamentary legitimacy."

Such remarks would predictably raise the ire of a number of hon. Members who object to that kind of approach, but to me the logic is inescapable.

Mr. Spearing: The hon. Gentleman said that to him the logic is inescapable. Does his party espouse Mr. von Weizsäcker's remarks, and are they similar to the remarks of Mr. Kohl and Mr. Delors?

Sir Russell Johnston: The short answer is yes. I shall refer in a moment to Mr. Delors.

Before making these points about European development, the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) made the kind of speech that one would not hear from the President of the Federal Republic of Germany or even from an ordinary member of the Bundestag, despite the fact that Germany's net payments to the Community far exceed ours. Germany's attitude is still very different from ours. I shall not weary the House with an extended rebuttal of the hon. Gentleman's tatty argument, in which he compared individual Government expenditures with our total net Community contribution. The last time that I remember that argument being trotted out ad nauseum was when Concorde was built. People said that if Concorde was not built we should be able to do this, that or the other. It was a poor argument.

I must comment, however, on the hon. Gentleman's strange remarks about the structural funds, which I did not understand. I presume that he agrees that the limited amount of money that is available for the structural funds, in particular for the regional fund, should go to the most needy countries in the Community, which are Portugal and Greece. Thereafter, one should look at the most needy areas and regions. Scotland has missed out considerably by not adopting earlier a more positive attitude to certain schemes that she could have implemented. However, because of enlargement, the position has changed.

Equally, when making such remarks, the hon. Gentleman ought to recognise that one of the failures of the United Kingdom's regional fund is that we have failed to operate the addionality rule and to a large extent have ourselves undermined the regional policy's effectiveness.

Mr. George Robertson: It is not a mean debating trick to point out the equivalent value of the payments to the European Community. I made those comparisons, but I make them more forcibly about the additional payments. The intergovernmental agreement will cover a one-off payment covering a hole in the budget about which there is severe disagreement. I know that it will appeal to the hon. Gentleman when I say that that figure is more than that for Scotland's housing programme in the current financial year. I refer to the additional payment and not to our net Community contribution, which can vary from year to year.

[Mr. George Robertson]

I will clarify my comment about the structural funds. Of course we are in favour of more money being paid, and we believe that it should go to the neediest countries and to the neediest areas within individual countries, such as our own. That can only sensibly be done if there is some curtailment of the money wasted on agriculture, which is a perfectly good area where savings could be made, so that the budget does not have to grow.

Sir Russell Johnston: I do not want to engage in an extended argument, particularly because of pressures of time. The hon. Member for Hamilton must surely recognise, as do other opponents and, in some cases, justified critics of the Community's excessive agricultural expenditure, that one cannot turn that situation around suddenly and quickly. The degree of agreement now achieved gives promise that it will happen, but in a steady and organised way. If one tries to make that change suddenly, and in a draconian fashion, which certain hon. Members sometimes suggest, it would cause great social upheaval.

I return to the democratic component. First, it remains utterly disgraceful that the United Kingdom continues distorting the whole political composition of the European Parliament by refusing to allow election to that Parliament in proportion to voting support, as do all other member countries. I see no justification for that injustice, and I regret the absence of any reference to it in the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

Secondly—I address these remarks to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing)—Jacques Delors is right when he says that we need to look now, as we reassess the basis of our financial contributions, towards what he called "an embryonic European government". That means looking actively for means whereby the European Parliament can play a steadily more significant part in overseeing Community policy and legislation; otherwise, there will be no directly elected democratic control. I say again that Jacques Delors is right and that the Prime Minister should congratulate him on his directness and foresight. What he suggests will not happen overnight, but that prospect must be faced.

Thirdly, it will also be necessary in the long term to examine direct finance-raising powers for the European Parliament.

I conclude by expressing disappointment at the thrust and style of the Foreign Secretary's speech.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): What thrust?

Sir Russell Johnston: That is a fair point—perhaps "thrust" is the wrong word, and I do not argue with that.

Mr. Budgen: The hon. Gentleman's speech could do with some thrust and style.

Sir Russell Johnston: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Sir Russell Johnston: I am grateful to you, Madam Deputy Speaker; I believe that there was some form of abusive remark, which I shall ignore.

The greater part of the Foreign Secretary's speech was given over to trying to prove that the United Kingdom has single-handedly reformed the whole European Community, and has done so in the face of opposition, hesitation, obstruction and goodness knows what else. Apparently, we had no allies in that struggle, because none was mentioned. It seems that we thought of it all ourselves and won the day by logic, remarkable innovative ability, and will power. Not only is that an even greater caricature of reality than is our representation in the European Parliament a mockery of the way in which people voted, but it gives no encouragement that the Government yet understand the need to begin concentrating on political solutions and arguments and to cast aside the old nationalist prejudices and out-dated nationalist attitudes that still colour our debates far too much.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) on the thrust and style of his speech. I know that the Labour party, such of it as is here at the moment, believes in open government, so I hope that it will not mind if I tell a little secret. Conservative Members have received a piece of paper from our Whips' Office, and under Monday night there are three black lines. Like most secrets, it is not what it seems. It is not a three-line Whip from the Government but a three-line Whip from Mr. Delors, that we should vote for this package tonight.

Let me explain what I am saying. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has throughout these negotiations done more than any human being could do, from the point of our national interests and from the point of view of the Community. Time after time she has to meet the same group of people. She has to sit down with them. She has to debate with them. She has to discuss with them. She has to take account of what is happening in Europe as a whole and what is happening in NATO as a whole. She does what is best for our country in those circumstances. But we are not the Prime Minister. We are the House of Commons —part of the Parliament of the United Kingdom. It is up to us also to do what we deem to be best for the interests of the United Kingdom and for Europe.

I should also like to congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary—I am sorry that he is not here at the moment—on the tremendous efforts that he has made on behalf of Britain and on behalf of the European Community. It is a question of damage limitation. He comes back here when the damage has been done. Perhaps we have been defeated, but not annihilated, and that is some progress. He comes back and says, as he is bound to do, that although it did not work last time —as he said last time—it will work this time. This time, he said that it did not work last time—it is going to work next time.

There is one point of criticism of my right hon. and learned Friend. The tax we are talking about and this financial package are complex. My right hon. and learned Friend said that of course it must be complex in order to be fair. He was for a time a very distinguished Chancellor of the Exchequer. When we have a system of taxation, to be fair it must be simple. People must be able to understand it. My constituents and the people out there do not have a clue what is being done on their behalf. One of the great criticisms of European Community finance is its complexity. People feel that they are being taken for a ride.

I shall be voting against the Bill for two reasons. The first reason is the less important. The two reasons are money and sovereignty. A haemorrhage of cash—that is important. But more important than that is the loss of sovereignty that is taking place, drip by drip, bit by bit, day by day—loss of sovereignty, the atrophy of a nation's soul. Take a commercial company. It can lose money. It can have a couple of years' losses, but it can still survive. But if it goes into liquidation, that is the end of it. That is what I am concerned about—the way in which we are moving in the European Community at the moment, our country is slowly, bit by bit, ceasing to exist as an independent national state.

We all of us in the House want control of expenditure. Community expenditure was up to a level of 1 per cent. VAT, then it went up to a level of 1·4 per cent. VAT. Now we are increasing the amount of money available to the Community by another one quarter—by another £1 in £4, I believe the Minister said; £5 where it was £4 before. But that is basically for the same group of policies. This time, we are increasing regional policies. We have been doing our best to cut down regional policies in the United Kingdom, but basically this additional money is buying us the same package as it did before.

There are two ways of looking at Community expenditure. First, there is the gross contribution—the amount of money that we spend on this fixed clutch of policies. We make a gross contribution to the Health Service and to the Ministry of Defence. Little by little, by 1, 2 or 3 per cent. a year, it goes up. But the Community gross expenditure for this area of policy controlled by the Community goes up by leaps and bounds, year after year. Surely what is good for financial control in Britain ought also to be good for financial control in the Community. If we can make it work here, why cannot they make it work there?

Secondly, there is the net contribution. The Community budget is a zero sum. Some people put money in, and some take it out. Why do we, even now, have to pay a vast sum into the Community budget, net, for nothing—our membership fee—when richer countries such as Holland, or those with overburdened levels of public expenditure but still richer than ourselves—such as Denmark—take money out? Countries such as Greece that do not even abide by the legislation and regulations that come out of the Community put their hands in the Community bowl and take out a lot of money. Why should we have that? There is no justice in it and no good reason for it. It is just history. Why should our people have to pay net vast sums into the Community budget?

We can control this expenditure. In an important speech, my right hon. and learned Friend talked about obligatory and non-obligatory expenditure. We can control all the expenditure in the Community. It is a simple matter. We do not have to have it on trust; we do not have to say whether the devices that my right hon. and learned Friend talked about today would work. All that we have to do is throw out the Bill today: no Bill, no money. The amount that the Community is allowed now is the amount that it would be allowed in the future. It would then have to cut its coat according to its cloth. When it has done that and we are getting value for money, we can come back to it again and see whether we want to vote it more money later.

Mr. Budgen: Why should we? There will be no need for it then.

Mr. Marlow: As my hon. Friend says so succinctly, if they have taken the medicine—taken the bait—got the message, they will not need the money. Let us do them a service. Let us vote against the Bill.

There is also the important question of sovereignty. The name of Mr. Delors has been mentioned. Mr. Delors, as we know—it must be so, as I saw it in an issue of European Parliament–EP News—said that before long 80 per cent. of legislation in the economic, financial and social spheres would be of a European nature and thus beyond the control of domestic legislatures. I think that we are a domestic legislature. I believe that we used to control 100 per cent. of the laws that affected the people of this country. In future, for every five issues that we control now —if I may return to the mathematics of the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson)—if Mr. Delors is right, we shall only have any control of, say in or influence over one. One fifth—that is how low we shall sink if Mr. Delors has his way.

Mr. Delors, of course, wants a united states of Europe. Do we want a united states of Europe? The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber, who has just left the Chamber, wants a united states of Europe. But does the House want it? Is that what we negotiated? Is that what my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) negotiated with the Community? If it was, why did he not tell the British people? Why should the British people be dragged kicking and screaming and by default into something that they have not been told about, when they were promised something else?

I do not believe that we want a united states of Europe. What we want—or what most of us want; some of my colleagues may not want it, but I am happy to have it—is a single European market. I am very much in favour of 1992, and of European co-operation in foreign and defence policy. We ought, with those with whom we have interests in common, to co-operate where we have those common interests. But to bring that about certain actions are necessary. Certain other actions are unnecessary, however, and those actions—those regulations, those directives—are being showered upon us day after day, week after week. Those unnecessary actions have nothing do do with a single European market or with co-operation between nation states, but they are very much to do with enmeshing us in a unified united states of Europe, which we have never requested or wanted.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Does my hon. Friend think that the country to which M. Jacques Delors belongs wants a united states of Europe either?

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend may have a point. The country to which he belongs may or may not want a united states of Europe. But given the way in which the institutions and powers are cast in the European Community at present, that is what it will get unless it does something about it. I hope that my hon. Friend will help me in taking the first slow step towards stopping it.

We in the House have slumbered to a certain extent while the legislation has been introduced. Because of that, we have been lumbered with various edicts with which we do not agree. Let me give a couple of examples of some of the things that have gone wrong. Recently, we were required by the European Court of Justice——

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): These foreigners have no sense of fair play.

Mr. Marlow: I am sure that my hon. Friend will make a very fluent and compelling speech later. In the meantime, if he will forgive me, I shall continue with mine.

Recently, we were required to put VAT on commercial construction. That is not necessary to a single unified European market. It is not necessary to free trade between free member countries of a European community. It is Europeanisation. How did it come about? On 29 November 1976, there was a debate in the House on a directive about VAT. Let me tell the story of that directive. That directive was scrutinised by the European legislation Select Committee and was referred to the Chamber for debate. It was debated late at night, and the vote finished after midnight. About 123 hon. Members voted—less than one fifth of the number in the House. The directive that was voted on then was not the complete directive; it then went back to Brussels and was changed significantly.

The vote that night was a vote to take note, not a vote to approve. If it had been a vote to approve, it would have been approval of something that was subsequently changed. The European Court of Justice interpreted that directive, which forced us to impose VAT on items on which the Government of this country did not wish to impose it. We were told that Parliament had had its chance, that Parliament had scrutinised it and that there had been parliamentary control over it. Nothing could be further than the truth. Parliament had no power and no control, and was not even involved in the final directive through which that VAT was raised.

There is a second way in which important things can go wrong. Part of the package of measures will be a directive that will measure the gross national product of each Community country, so that we can assess the amount that must go into the European kitty. That directive was to be assessed by the European legislation Select Committee. There is something called a scrutiny reserve. The Government should not reach an agreement on the directive until it has been debated in the House, if that is what the Select Committee wishes the House to do.

The Select Committee did not have an earthly. The Government overruled it. The directive has been agreed. This is an important directive: it decides how we are to assess exactly how much each Community country will have to pay into the Community kitty. There are good things in it. It is not bureaucratic. Each country will decide what is its own gross national product. Or is that such a good thing? What is Italy going to decide about its gross national product? How will we in the House be able to influence it? When will we be able to debate it? What Italy does not pay, we shall have to pay. That is it: that is the end of sovereignty. That is the end of our control over the issue.

Mr. Delors is right when he says that there is something called the democratic deficit. There is no democratic control over these matters at all. Vitally important issues that would in the past have taken weeks of legislative time are going through on the nod because of the lack of proper democratic control. What can we do about it? We are the only people who have a chance of doing anything about it. If someone feels hard done by, he can have recourse to the law. We can take the matter to the European Court of Justice. But can we? Is it a court of justice or is it a court of Europeanisation? It is not the former; it is the latter. The European Court of Justice is there to impose a centrally controlled European state on the member nations of the European Community.

What else can we do? We can give more power, influence and discretion to the European Parliament, but will it be objective? Is not the common characteristic of almost everyone who sits in the European Parliament that, individually and collectively, they all want a united states of Europe?

If we cannot rely on the Court or on the European Parliament, there is only one institution that we can rely on —the House of Commons. Slowly, the lifeblood of nation states ebbs away; the powers of the House are shorn just as surely as Samson had his locks cut. There is a solution, a cure to this near terminal disease. It is painful, risky and controversial. It is to throw out the Bill.

6.30 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I can answer one of the questions posed by the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow). He, like the Chairman of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), referred to the gross national product directive: it is COM(88)176. It has been referred for debate by the Select Committee on European Legislation, of which I have the honour to be Chairman.

That document is notionally being included in today's debate, but the fact that such a sharp-eyed Member as the hon. Member for Northampton, North and such a well-informed person as the right hon. Member for Worthing were not aware that the document was being debated—I must admit that until just before the debate it had escaped my memory, too—shows the extent to which the House is already not even scrutinising the matters that its own Select Committee suggests that it should. I do not blame anyone in particular. It is the mass of paper that descends on us from Brussels that has put us in this parlous state. It is a little parable of the difficulties that face us.

The Paymaster General courteously wrote to me some time ago saying that it would be for the convenience of all to discuss this document in this debate, and my Committee acquiesced in that. Nevertheless, given the numbers of documents that we have it is easy for some of them to be overlooked, and it is hardly possible to discuss the document this afternoon——

Mr. Higgins: It would seem from the answer that we received after the Hanover summit about GNP statistics that the Prime Minister had also failed to realise that.

Mr. Spearing: That may well be so.

The Prime Minister and hon. Members have forgotten several things. As recently as Thursday last the Prime Minister said:

"the principal achievements of our forebears in 1688 remain and ensure that the will of the people be exercised through Parliament rather than by intimidation or pressure practised by any one group or faction."—[Official Report, 7 July 1988; Vol. 136, c. 1231.]

Alas, I do not believe that is so. It is clear that Parliament, perhaps through its own choice in 1972, does not enjoy that power now. Sixteen eighty-eight is a reminder to us that, in respect of the intergovernmental undertaking of which this Bills seeks to approve, we are supplying the deficit in 1988.

Supplying the deficit is a fundamental piece of parliamentary language: we vote supply. Originally, that was to supply the deficit incurred by the Crown, I suspect that we are back in the waters of 1688, because we are being invited by the Bill to supply the deficit in the funding of the EEC which, under article 199 of the treaty of Rome, is illegal, because it states that the budget must be in balance, which it clearly is not. If it were, the second part of the Bill would not exist.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, contrary to what he has just said about the Prime Minister's remarks about the glorious revolution, we retain the power in this House by virtue of the fact that we passed the European Communities Act 1972? That is a crucial point, and it remains. Furthermore, if we used the procedures of the House, as I have consistently argued that we should, to enable us to scrutinise what is happening more effectively, we would be able retain the degree of real control represented by what is called sovereignty.

Mr. Spearing: The hon. Gentleman is confusing approval of a particular tax—VAT, for example—with our power of removing section 2(1) of the 1972 Act. But the real day-by-day control by voting money and creating laws has, to some extent, departed.

Mr. Dykes: Will the hon. Gentleman agree with two quick points? First, remarkably, in February last year the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee agreed that £150 billion of United Kingdom Government spending went through this place on the nod and unnoticed, much of it late at night, with most hon. Members paying not the slightest attention to it. On the other hand, a single pound increase in Community expenditure attracts monumental hysteria on the part of certain anti-EEC hon. Members. Is not that a reflection of double standards and hypocrisy?

As Chairman of the Scrutiny Committee, would the hon. Gentleman agree that if there were a national Committee scrutinising every item of domestic legislation, it, too, would be swamped by the weight of legislation? So that is not a material point. Are not the hon. Gentleman's remarks tantamount to saying that he and his Committee are not doing their job properly?

Mr. Spearing: I shall not give way again; time presses. The House has the opportunity, through its own procedures, to call a halt to expenditure or legislation at any time. Whether hon. Members choose to use that potential adequately is a matter that we can debate. I shall return to the hon. Gentleman's remarks at the end of my speech, when I deal with the prospective value added tax. Unless the House takes further steps it does not have the same degree of potential control over European matters as it has over the things that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. However, I agree that it is desirable that the Scrutiny Committee, of which he and I are members, should be able to scrutinise more deeply and that there should be more glasnost about European matters in the House, because as has been shown, we do not have the proper means to ensure transparency in what is afoot.

I shall illustrate the degree to which we have already lost control by referring to the passing of the Single European Act, which the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) gaily voted for, whereas others, notably the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) were aghast when they discovered what they had agreed to.

Article 100A of the treaty of Rome stipulates that any legislation relating to the achievement of the single European market can be passed in the Council of Ministers by a qualified majority. It is possible for a law passed by the Council of Ministers which is a directly acting regulation to be imposed on the House even if the ministerial representative of the British Government in Brussels votes against it.

The hon. Member for Harrow, East has said that that is democracy, but I question that. The Council of Ministers does not meet in public; it is rather like Parliament was before 1688—or even further back. It does not yet have our democratic controls, and the debate in the House that precedes a Council of Ministers' decision has no control, as yet, over what the Minister does there. All that we can do is to have a debate brought about by the Scrutiny Committee and perhaps by the resolution, but we cannot control the Minister. The Minister goes away and decides whether the Government will vote yes or no. The Prime Minister decides whether under article 99 the new VAT excise proposed by Lord Cockfield will be imposed on the House.

Mr. Dykes rose——

Mr. Spearing: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman because he will have a better opportunity to speak about the matter in Committee.

I hope that I have illustrated to the House how we have lost detailed control of legislation from Brussels which even the Government opposed and of prospective VAT on such things as books, newspapers, water, public transport, drugs and charities. The imposition of that tax will depend on how the Prime Minister or the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whoever that may be, behaves in the Council of Ministers. The House will be able to debate only the general principle, and the Prime Minister or the Chancellor will negotiate.

During the election campaign the Prime Minister did not say, as she could have said, that the Government would object and use their so-called veto on unanimity voting—if that operates—to prevent any increase in value added tax. If she had said that, most people would have agreed that it was right, but she did not. She said that she would veto VAT on children's clothing and on fuel and power but she did not say that she would veto the items in the list that I have read out. When the Prime Minister or the Chancellor of the Exchequer or perhaps, appropriately enough, the Paymaster General, who is competent in these matters, goes to the Finance Council, he or she will have to take the Cabinet's decision on the matter and not the decision of the House.

There is a way out in respect of VAT and it is not by refusing to pass the Bill. I commend the method to the hon. Member for Northampton, North, who asked what we could do. It would be possible and appropriate this year when we are celebrating 300 years of the House's superiority over the Crown to tell the Ministers of the Crown that they can go to the European Councils only if they do or do not do certain things. It is quite within the power of the House to pass such a resolution and it is not outwith the treaty of Rome. That is what the Folketing in Denmark has done ever since Denmark has been a member of the Community. It is a matter of the internal constitution of our land. One of the steps that we could take to ensure that the House has control in future is to pass such a resolution.

I shall now pursue the Prime Ministerial cries. The Prime Minister is adept at persuading the British public that she somehow does not like the European Community. She reminds me of a person who loves to go racing and who perhaps spends too freely on the horses. Such a person says that he does not want to be dragged to race meetings but when he gets there he is in his element. Why is the Prime Minister in her element when she gets to the EEC? It is because she is a worshipper, as are Conservative Members, of the free market. If we are to have a single European market that is free of frontiers, as the treaty dictates, somebody must decide the rules on either side of what was a frontier. That presupposes a supranational authority and if one is not there one must be established. That is as plain as a pikestaff.

Conservative Members talk a great deal about education and one of the matters they talk about is the need for Latin. I do not think that Latin grammar is very good but Latin vocabulary is very important. There is all the difference in the world between inter and super and extra and ultra. If we are to be international there must be something to be international about. I think that there is some agreement about that in all parts of the House. But the treaty of Rome is not international. By intent, purpose, operation and structure it is supranational. I see that the hon. Member for Harrow, East agrees. The institutions are there. Mr. Delors and Herr Kohl are quite right. Those institutions were there from the origin of the Community. There is the Council, the Commission, the Parliament and the Court, and those four institutions are growing in power day by day.

My final point is that the House has added to the power of those institutions against its will. The Government have also done that and I shall prove it. When the Prime Minister was invited in Milan to agree to an international conference to revise the Treaty of Rome, she said that a new treaty was not needed and suggested progress by pragmatism. She was probably right, but what happened? There was an international conference and we had a new Single European Act, very detailed and full, which provides for the majority voting of which I spoke. That is in one of the important articles, article 100A. The Government did not want that Act and to some extent they managed to dilute it—or so they thought. I suppose that some people thought that it was not strong enough —people such as Mr. Tindemans and others.

The Act was brought to the House in 1986 and put through on the guillotine, even though we have proof positive that the Government did not want it at all. Since when have the Government brought to the House a Bill with which they disagreed, and put it through on a guillotine? That is the extent to which the Prime Minister is dragged hapless into supporting an increasing tendency for power in the EEC.

That brings me to my concluding thought, which is about 1688. In that year the monarchy was sent packing by the House because the House said that it would decide the finance and the law. Today we have a new proto-monarchy and a new proto-imperium which is growing daily in Brussels. It is time that the House cut off the air supply to Brussels.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): The hon. Members who have expressed concern about the Bill, none with more passion than my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) or with more remorseless logic than the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), were right to express fears. The agreement on finance in the Community to which the Bill gives the force of law is a major step towards giving the European Community an independent existence and a means to sustain it. I quite understand why that process is deeply upsetting to hon. Members in all parts of the House.

Faced with these fears and concerns, some Ministers, although not on this occasion my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, have sought to dismiss them as groundless or, at worst, as greatly exaggerated. People who adopt that attitude will lay up trouble for themselves in the House and in the country if they seek merely to quell those doubts by bland assurances. That will be all the more likely if those bland assurances are the reverse side of a coin, the front of which is a policy towards the Community that aims to secure all our national interests without being prepared in return to make any concessions to the national interests of others except as part of a very crude horse trade that refuses to accept that closer co-operation between member states is a good thing in itself and will bring benefits to all members of the Community.

To be communautaire is to be an effective champion of national interests. The kind of minimalist, apologetic approach to the Community that I have been decrying is not, in the fairly short run, the best way for Ministers to avoid trouble, although no doubt it will avert any possibility of their seeing their majority shrink too much at the end of the debate. Far less is it the way to derive maximum benefit for the United Kingdom and its people from membership of the Community.

Ministers would be far better advised to go over to the attack, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary did so conspicuously in the debate. They should demonstrate the gains that can come not only to the Community as a whole but to each of its members and to the United Kingdom by a maximalist and enthusiastic policy of co-operation.

It is true that national Parliaments are losing influence and power to the institutions of the European Community, although perhaps not to the European Parliament, which is not yet a proper Parliament in the sense that we understand it here, with the power to overthrow or effectively criticise Governments. However, even the European Parliament may have to become a proper Parliament if national Parliaments continue to behave like the Parliament of Lilliput and continue to fail so lamentably in their job of effective democratic control of the Council of Ministers, which is, of course, where power resides in the European Community, as the hon. Member for Newham, South pointed out.

This Parliament, by treating the European Parliament and its Members as some kind of lepers who have to ring bells before they can gain entry, has contrived to achieve the worst of all possible worlds. National Parliaments are losing influence because they cling so pathetically to the illusions of national sovereignty after the reality has gone. Those illusions make no sense at all in these days of nuclear defence, worldwide pollution of the environment, the overweening powers of multinational corporations and the problems of footloose hot money and Third-world debts.

An example only the other day brought that home vividly. Our overcrowded air space is putting air travellers in danger because national air traffic control systems will not accept the overriding authority of Eurocontrol, so, as an aircraft passes from one airspace to another, it has to switch from one system of control to another.

Co-operation is very much in our interests in respect of the European monetary system—we should have joined the exchange rate mechanism long ago—and, above all, in the calls for a European central bank, which were so summarily dismissed by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. Of course we can dismiss those ideas as Utopian, but they do not appear Utopian to our partners. We once dismissed the idea of a Single European Act as totally unnecessary, but we now bless it as one of the few ways in which any decisions can be taken within the Community of 12. If we continue to block agreement on such matters as the European central bank, we shall find that we are losing one of our principal assets within the European Community—the vital role played by the City of London as the principal financial centre of the European Community.

I say to hon. Members who have expressed their doubts about or hostility towards the Bill that they were quite right. The measure is a step towards an independent, self-sustaining Community, although not, alas, towards federalism. If they can defeat it—my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North made no secret of his desire to do so—we could then preserve the tattered shreds of sovereignty and we could become a sort of proud, independent western European Albania. Is that really the way in which a great nation such as ours can play the part that it is called to play in one of the world's three superpowers? Is that the way to ensure the prosperity, safety and hopes of our people?.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): I am sorry that the Foreign Secretary is not with us, because he would have heard some interesting speeches—the great candour of the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) about the reality of the loss of parliamentary sovereignty; the pure joy expressed by the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) whenever he hears that this nation has been stripped of, and that this Parliament has lost, more and more powers; and some good suggestions from my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) about how, if we have the will to do so, we can gain greater control over Ministers before they give their consent to propositions, resolutions, decisions and directives in the Council of Ministers.

I understand—I can hardly believe it—that the Foreign Secretary is appearing on the Terry Wogan show. I find it a strange discourtesy to the House and a strange choice of priorities that the Foreign Secretary, introducing a Bill seeking to tax the British people and hand over the proceeds to the European Commission, should leave this Chamber and prefer to be summoned into the presence of Mr. Terry Wogan in some studio, wherever it may be, in London. It is as though he himself believed the prophecies of those who say that, in a few years' time, we shall be reduced to nothing more than a provincial assembly. The Foreign Secretary owes the House an apology and I hope very much that we shall hear from his right hon. Friend the Paymaster General, who will wind up the debate, that there is a reason other than a television interview to explain the Foreign Secretary's absence.

Mr. Budgen: Does not the right hon. Gentleman think that, even in a borough council, if an important speaker in a debate went off to appear on the local town chat show, even the borough council might take it amiss?

Mr. Shore: I have made my point, and the hon. Gentleman makes his point, which reinforces it.

That apart, I was going to say that I thought it extremely fitting that the Foreign Secretary should introduce this Bill and debate because, after all, it is a finance Bill. The Foreign Secretary is an ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer, but this is a finance Bill of a special kind because it is a European finance Bill and the Foreign Secretary has quite a track record in that area. It was he who last introduced such a measure—European Communities (Finance) Act—in June 1985. We are now seeking to withdraw that Bill and to substitute the measure before us today. No one more than the Foreign Secretary can claim to be, if not the author, the co-author, of the original European Communities Act 1972, which first imposed the European Community's tax regime on the British people.

We knew then, at the end of those protracted negotiations with the EEC, that the terms of entry were heavily disadvantageous. That was shown nowhere more clearly than in the arrangements made for the British contribution to the EEC budget. Why was it so disadvantageous? The House probably knows why, but there are two clear reasons. First, EEC budget expenditure was, and still is, overwhelmingly in support of agriculture and was bound to be much less in Britain, with its comparatively small agricultural sector, than in other continental European nations.

Secondly, although our receipts from the EEC budget would be smaller, our tax burdens would be heavier. Levies on imported foodstuffs and customs duties on third country imports were bound to fall with exceptional severity on the United Kingdom, whose pattern of food and non-food trade was much more heavily geared to the Commonwealth and other non-European countries than was the case with out continental neighbours.

The problem that originated with the treaty of accession and the European Communities Act 1972 remain with us today. It is fitting, therefore, that the Foreign Secretary, like Sisyphus in Hades, is condemned and doomed to push up the hill the boulder of reform of the CAP and changes in the European tax system and to see it fall down again to the bottom of the hill, where he has once again to resume his labours.

To be fair, the Prime Minister has fought hard to reduce those original burdens. She negotiated a temporary refund on a year-by-year basis for the first three years of her premiership. Then, at the Fontainebleau summit in 1984, she secured what was described as a durable system for the abatement of our contribution. That was an abatement of two thirds of the United Kingdom deficit of budget payments to, over receipts from, the EEC, to be deducted from the United Kingdom VAT payment.

But to obtain that abatement, a price had to be paid. The previous ceiling on VAT contributions of 1 per cent. was raised to 1·4 per cent. To those who questioned that virtual 40 per cent. increase in the EEC's own resources only four years ago, the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary gave specific assurances that CAP spending would be curbed by budgetary disciplines year by year.

Now, in the Bill before us today, we have a re-run of 1985. Once again, the EEC has been authorised to increase its tax take. But instead of increasing the 1·4 per cent. VAT contribution to a new ceiling of 1·6 per cent.—as had been envisaged in the 1985 Finance Act—a new formula has been evolved, to cap the VAT base at 55 per cent. of GNP in each member state, while maintaining the maximum rate at 1·4 per cent. In addition, a fourth own resources tax has been added. That is to take the form of a percentage of GNP at whatever rate is needed to make up the budget over and above the yield of the other three own resource taxes. In all this, the United Kingdom abatement is to be retained. It will still consist of 66 per cent. of the difference between our payments and our receipts.

Again, let us consider the price that has had to be paid. The Community, whose tax yield under own resources was increased by 40 per cent. only three years ago, is now to have a further increase of 25 per cent., with a new ceiling of 1·2 per cent. of Community GNP—equivalent to 1·9 per cent. VAT. Once again, we are assured that agricultural spending will be controlled by budgetary discipline, by the so-called legally binding mechanisms for each of the agricultural stabilisers.

Judging by the Bill and its predecessor in 1985, the British bargaining has amounted to this: the United Kingdom receives some abatement of its original intolerable and unsustainable net financial burden, and in return, abandons its veto, its one power to reshape the EEC budget, and is obliged to permit an increase in EEC expenditure and taxation. Each time, of course, the United Kingdom pays more.

What it has meant for Britain in terms of its net contribution since the Fontainebleau summit is a net contribution of £759 million in 1985, £943 million in 1986 and £1,125 million in 1987. The estimate for 1988 is £1,250 million and for 1989, £1,500 million. That is roughly a 100 per cent. increase in the United Kingdom's net contribution in four years. In the same period, the total spend of the European Community will have risen from 28 billion ecu in 1985 to an estimated 46 billion ecu in 1989 —a vast increase of some 64 per cent., but still significantly less than the increase in the United Kingdom's net contribution.

At the same time, we note that the draft general budget of the European Community for this year, 1988, within a total of 43·4 billion ecu, will spend no less than 30·7 billion ecu on all forms of agricultural expenditure. This is made up of the guarantee expenditure, the guidance section and, in addition, the new provisions to underpin the ecu-dollar exchange rate and the amount set aside for the depreciation and disposal of existing surplus agriculture stocks. The total commitment to agricultural expenditure is 30·7 billion ecu, or more than 70 per cent. of the total budget.

I have been listening to Ministers making speeches about reforming the CAP and reducing its share of the total EEC budget since 1964. When the first Macmillan negotiation took place, Mr. Marjolin and Mr. Mansholt produced great plans for reforming a then intolerably expensive and inefficient CAP. But in those days, it did not take more than 70 per cent. of the total. Throughout the 1980s, there has been only one year in which it has exceeded the 70 per cent. that we are committed to paying during 1988. If that is an example of how budgetary disciplines work, I am not at all impressed with them, and nor should any other right hon. or hon. Member be. So much for cost control of the EEC budget.

The House can easily anticipate within the next three years, if not before, another European Community finance bill raising still further the EEC tax ceiling and budget expenditures, and the British Government once again conceding it, and withholding their veto because of the fear of losing their abatement, in part or altogether. When the House makes its decision tonight, hon. Members should reflect on the fact that the Bill, to increase further the taxation of the British people and to transfer that tax yeild to the Commissioners in Brussels, is only a part of a continuing process of steady erosion of the rights of the House and of the British people, with a corresponding growth and extension of Community competence throughout taxation, legislation and policy decisions.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) cannot have enough of it, and mentions with regret the facts that we are not members of European monetary system, that we have not abolished altogether our separate financial institutions and that we do not have a common currency or a central European bank to look after our financial and monetary affairs. But that is not the view of most hon. Members. In the past 12 months, zero-rating provisions of our own VAT legislation have been swept aside unceremoniously by decisions of the European Court. We know, too, that the Single European Act, with its commitment to a Europe without frontiers by 1992, threatens an unprecedented harmonisation of virtually all United Kingdom indirect taxation, and a widespread extention of majority voting throughout the EEC.

We have seen the Government's plans for the disposal of Austin Rover to British Aerospace delayed and jeopardised by the intervention of the Commission. Only last Wednesday, Mr. Jacques Delors, the President of the European Commission, before the European Assembly, told us that this House and the existing system of national Parliaments in Europe would have to give way to the embryo of a European Government within the next seven years.

I warn the House now—I address my warning to my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Labour Front Bench as well as to the Paymaster General—that the issue of Britain's membership of the EEC, now dormant, will remain so only so long as it remains basically a customs union, with sensible co-ordination of economic, environmental and other policies—in other words, a Europe des patries. But if the trend continues towards a European union, a federal Europe, a European Government, and if our democracy and our Parliament are to be stripped progressively of the powers that make us a sovereign state, of that sovereignty that belongs inalienably to our own people, to future generations as much as to those who have the rights of citizenship today, there will be a tidal wave of protest and opposition. The whole bizarre, unnatural and flimsy structure of European Commission, European Court, European Assembly and the thousand and one treaties that have burgeoned forth will be swept away.

7.8 pm

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): I wish that I had made as fine a speech as that of the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore). For many years he has spoken for so many of us who feel the pull and the inspiration of British nationalism. His was a fine statement of that nationalism which is felt in every class and every section of the British community, and which, to a very large extent, is now denied even by the Labour party.

The main purpose of my speech is to give a sincere and unqualified apology to the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston). Four years ago, when we were debating the proposed increase in VAT from 1 per cent. to 1·4 per cent., the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber got up and said that his party, the Liberal party, was in favour of a very substantial increase in the take from VAT, up to 2 per cent. I remember rudely deriding all that.

On that happy note, the whole of the Tory party present at the time agreed with me. It was ridiculous to suppose that any party should be so ridiculously and fanatically in favour of the EEC as to want to increase the rate of VAT to 2 per cent. Not only that, but the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber explained that the Liberal party, and especially Lord Jenkins, who was then the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead, who was not often the flavour of the week with the Tory party, were in favour of a massive increase in the structural and regional funds.

On that note of abuse and rhetoric, I was able to find whole-hearted support from the whole of the Tory party, as I abused the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber. Now, of course, we find that these proposals are not quite the increase to 2 per cent. as the hon. Gentlemen wanted. Sadly, the increase is only up to 1·9 per cent.

Everyone who votes in favour of the Bill tonight should be aware that the Liberal party and Lord Jenkins have entirely converted all the Tory party, and they have subverted the Prime Minister, to their views. They are owed the deepest apology. They have won in every respect. The Government have become as ridiculously Euro-fanatic as we believed the Liberal party was four years ago.

Sadly, I am not authorised to apologise on behalf of the Government. However, I repeat my deep apology. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) was particularly vocal about the measure some four years ago and I am certain that he will also want to apologise. We who derided the Liberal party and who continue to deride it are now a small and disgusting minority in the Tory party. Tonight, when the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber enters the Lobby with the bulk of the Government, I hope that he is greeted as the friend that he should be recognised for. Most of all, he should be applauded because he has won on the structural funds.

My right hon. Friend the chairman of the Tory party has been very helpful. He has given all of us who wished to apply at the Whips Office a most excellent Conservative research department brief, which is much more informative than any document that the Foreign Office gave my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary. That brief emphasises in very clear terms that, as a result of the massive increase in the funds for the Community, the structural fund will be increased in real terms by 80 per cent.

That is a very useful figure. By increasing that part of the budget which is not spent on the CAP, it enables the Government to say that they have kept the CAP down as a proportion of overall expenditure to the derisory amount of only 70 per cent. or whatever it is. That is plainly a sign of the fundamental reforms that were promised four years ago, which are promised now again today and which will be promised again in three years' time. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary said on Wednesday, we are taking concrete steps towards reforming the CAP and we will continue to take concrete, but not dramatic, steps towards reforming it.

While a massive extension of the structural funds may pose little philosophical doubt in the minds of Labour Members, with the exception of those splendid British nationalists who want to rely on the membership of the House of Commons and the concept of sovereignty even before they are Socialists, I would have thought that for a Tory Government who are alleged to be totally dominated by Thatcherism—whatever that may be—there must be at least some explanation for the 80 per cent. increase in real terms in the structural funds before we vote.

The structural fund is designed so that the EEC may progress towards economic and social convergence. In short, it is a practical expression of EEC Socialism. The concept of the structural fund means that, if we go to the toe of Italy and happen to notice that people there seem less economically active than people in Stuttgart, or if they have less money than people in Stuttgart, we may say to them, "My friends, we are going to shake you into economic and social convergence. We shall either do it by directive or by showering money on you. But in some way or another, you've got to become the same as the people in Stuttgart."

Sir Russell Johnston: The hon. Gentleman's speech is going off course. I thought that he was redeemed.

Mr. Budgen: I do not think so.

When the great and the good go to the toe of Italy and try to shake the Sicilians into becoming like those people who manage the Scottish Widows' Fund in Edinburgh, they may find that the good people of Sicily simply take the money, but do not want to converge. They may want to use the money for greater leisure.

It is extraordinary that the Prime Minister can say that she welcomes the extension of this vast social fund because she believes that we will get some kickbacks from the money that we put in. Perhaps we shall, but what has the Prime Minister to say about the handling costs? What about all those gentlemen in Brussels who will be signing the cheques, receiving the money and deciding whether Tom, Dick or Harry should receive this largesse? She does not seem to recognise that the costs will be great.

Before the House votes for this vast increase in the structural funds, I hope that hon. Members will understand that there is a fundamental ambiguity about the way in which the EEC handles its funds. That ambiguity is raised constantly whenever we debate the reports from the European Court of Auditors.

I remember some years ago accompanying my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) to talk to the splendid gentlemen who run the European Court of Auditors. We sat for half a morning listening to them. I was feeling rather tired, so I was able to contain myself for nearly an hour. I listened to a story about the number of olive trees in southern Italy. I was told that if there were that number of olive trees, there would not be one house, one field or one runway in the south of Italy. I heard all about cows in Bavaria.

Eventually, I decided that it sounded as if there was gross fraud in the way in which money was distributed in the EEC. I asked the gentleman a few unkind questions. After that, my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham straightened his Rifle Brigade tie and asked me to go outside. He gave me the worst rocket that I had received since I was late as a national service subaltern. I stood to attention and mumbled that I was very sorry. It made me reflect even more on the ambiguity that we shall never have an EEC system for policing expenditure in the EEC.

If, for the sake of argument, we arranged for the Metropolitan police fraud squad to go to Sicily, there would be a major uprising there against the assertion that there was some form of central control in the EEC. In the same way, I have no doubt that if a gentleman from Italy came to inquire about the amount of quota that was or was not being used on a dairy farm in Britain, there would be a strong resurgence of English nationalism and the Italian would be invited to leave the farm.

Therefore, there will be no accountability for the bulk of expenditure on the structural fund. The House will not have proper control and there will be no philosophical agreement, because the proposal is based on a belief in equality and in social, industrial and pan-European convergence. That is completely antipathetic to everything that Conservative Members have been taught to believe in during the past 15 years or so. The Prime Minister used to oppose the extension of the structural fund, yet she comes back to the House and mouths words which imply that she approves of it.

We should remember that, if the EEC institutions had been reformed, the Bill would be unnecessary. If we want to extend the policy of regional development, we can do so through our own national policies in the House. The Bill is unnecessary; it is, most of all, an affront to anybody who has any sense of the history of this House.

Ms. Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): When we debate the Bill we are examining the priorities within the EEC and, in particular, the British Government's priorities in the European negotiations in which they take part. Having listened to the Foreign Secretary, it seems that the Government's European priorities do not appeal greatly to the Opposition and I had the strong impression that few Tory Members were convinced by his remarks. The reaction was—to put it mildly—somewhat mixed.

It is clear that the much-trumpeted budget agreement on spending and on the way ahead leaves much to be desired, especially for the citizens of the United Kingdom and it does not give a particularly good deal to most of the other citizens of the EEC. The priorities of agricultural reform and control of agricultural spending are priorities which we all share, but progress seems to have been almost non-existent. We seem to have been marching in the wrong direction in the past year, as there has been an increase in agricultural spending.

The system of export refunds and the huge gap between world and EEC prices persist, and little seems to be being done about that. We are still far from a fundamental reform of the agricultural policy or agricultural spending. We are told that the great priority for the Government is the creation of the large single market in 1992. Every time we switch on our televisions sets we are assailed by glossy advertisements telling us of the benefits that will accrue. That naive trust in the automatic benefits of a large, free market is unjustified.

I should like to suggest four priority areas for the Government to consider in their EEC spending and policies. They are regional, industrial, social and environmental priorities and I should like to deal with each briefly.

I do not believe that the budget settlement gives a good deal to most of Britain's regions, despite the increase in the structural funds. We have learnt that the regions will be divided into two categories. Category 1, which is basically for agricultural, underdeveloped countries of southern Europe, plus Ireland and Northern Ireland, will get by far the lion's share. While I accept that those areas have real needs and I would not like to deny them any funds, I am worried that the second priority, which is the money given to declining industrial regions, will be severely downgraded as a result of the agreement. I do not want to see that happen.

Coming from the northern region of England, I fear that that region, which has the highest level of unemployment of any region in the United Kingdom, apart from Northern Ireland, may receive much less from the European Community budget in the future. I should like the Government to give us a commitment tonight that that will not happen and that in their continuing negotiations in the coming months they will do their utmost to promote the profile of the northern region and the other industrial regions of Britain.

It does not help regional policy when the Prime Minister keeps telling other European countries how well we are doing. That masks the reality of Britain as we know it and the dramatic regional divisions which persist. Regional policy means more than just funds. I am concerned that unless some compensatory measures are taken, the creation of the internal market will be bad news for the regions and will simply increase the prosperity of the already prosperous areas to the detriment of the needy parts of the country.

I should like the Government to give us a commitment that there will be a proper detailed study of the likely effects of the internal market on our least prosperous regions. The Government should not move towards the internal market unless they can come up with some detailed figures to show the benefits to the regions. No such detailed regional study has been undertaken.

The Government's lack of commitment to regional spending and regional policy could not have been made clearer to me today with the announcement that the Marconi radar factory in Gateshead will close. The other

Marconi factory, in Chelmsford, is situated in an area where there are job vacancies for that type of employment. That shows on both a British and an EEC level the Government's total failure to stand by those regions that most need help and positive policies.

On industrial policy, the United Kingdom Government have failed to provide any EEC funds to help older industries such as steel, shipbuilding and textiles to renew themselves and have woefully neglected to provide research and development money on an EEC level. In fact, the United Kingdom Government are well-known for blocking money for EEC research and development. They took a great deal of time to agree the research framework programme, and in 1986 the amount of EEC budget that was spent on energy research was only 2·1 per cent. That was lower than the amount given to support tobacco growers, who managed to get 2·3 per cent. of the budget.

The third area of priority for the Government should be social measures. Again, they need to be considered in conjunction with the whole debate about the internal market. In the Government's desire to see common standards and freedom from barriers on trade—I concede that they sometimes have beneficial effects—there has been virtually no discussion of other matters such as the common social benefits of policies that could improve people's quality of life. That has been conspicuously absent. European Report states:

"The Prime Minister argues in favour of deregulation on all fronts even in the social sphere. She apparently expressed her desire for no new rules in the realm of company law relating to worker participation in company structures. This dampening down of any commitment to regulate economic and social equilibrium in the Community was greeted with disappointment, notably by President Mitterand who said 'It is shocking that progress has been made to free the movement of capital but workers have been left by the wayside.'"

The Government have taken a cheeseparing, penny-pinching attitude to environmental issues and have been unwilling to campaign for or agree to an increase in moneys to fight environmental pollution which threatens us all and seems to be one of the most important issues on which EEC countries can co-operate. I am thinking of money to fight the threat of acid rain and to prevent more of it from being produced, to combat the depletion of the ozone layer, to clean up our beaches—our performance has been disgraceful—and to improve the quality of our drinking water, which still fails to meet EEC standards in many areas. The Government should have given a much higher priority to those issues.

What are the Government trying to create? Is it a European Community which will help people or simply a Europe for big business and capital? Surely the pursuit of profit should not be an end in itself but a means to an improved quality of life for all. In terms of improving the quality of life for the general population of the EEC and particularly for those in the least prosperous regions, the Government's EEC policies and their spending priorities have been an abject failure.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): The hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) seemed to favour an increase in the European Community budget. If that is the case, she is the only hon. Member, except for one or two of my hon. Friends, who has so far done so in this debate.

I thought twice about putting my name down for this debate and if I had known that my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) would refer to me in the terms that he did, I would have thought three times. My recollection of the incident differs markedly from his and the only resemblance is that I have my regimental tie on today, just as then, in order to give him a similar rebuke.

I have not spoken in a European debate for some time because I have felt that the arguments were much the same. I approach this subject as an EC supporter, but one who is entirely cynical about the assurances given on every occasion when budget measures are introduced.

First, as the House will know, we are invited to vote for a Bill which increases our net contribution to the Community budget by £200 million to £300 million a year. Our share under the intergovernmental agreement is some £765 million at a particular rate of exchange with the ecu. How does that square with the estimate in the public expenditure White Paper on total expenditure for 1988-89 of £1,780 million? If there is a difference, it will undoubtedly come from the contingency reserve, but I should like my hon. Friend the Minister to define what he thinks the net difference will be.

The increase has arisen because of the increasing expense of the common agricultural policy. I was delighted to hear my right hon and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary say that he wanted to convert ploughshares into golf clubs. As the parliamentary golf champion I welcome that suggestion, but it shows the extent to which our policy has changed so that we are talking about supporting, not farmers and their production, but an agricultural community. That is important not only for internal budgetary reasons or European budgetary reasons, but for the real danger that exists of forming a tariff wall against imports of agricultural products from other countries, particularly the United States of America.

The House will know that the United States Congress has passed a trade Act. If conditions become more difficult for the United States as they find further difficulty in reducing their budget deficit, they will certainly take countervailing measures against the EC. The best way we can help the United States and, indeed, other countries is to reform the common agricultural policy and allow more imports of agricultural products. That would do a great deal to help our cost of living and it would improve and increase efficiency, of which we stand in need.

It is absurd that so much money has been spent on agriculture for so many years, and further work needs to be done. That not only has a serious impact on the United States and other countries, but has its worst impact on developing countries which are unable to export their agricultural surpluses to us.

I am not an opponent of the European Community. I have watched developments with interest for some time and we must admit that we do not possess the clout within the EC that we should. We are in danger of becoming too much of an observer. Never an enthusiastic member of the EC, always thinking about the snags and difficulties, there is a risk of finding ourselves in a halfway house, neither a full member of it nor prepared to accept the progress that is going on, and at the same time jibbing at and finding fault with almost every aspect of it.

I used to be agnostic about the European monetary system, but recently I have come to believe that it would be to our national advantage to join it. It is time that we examined our attitude and policy. It is not a question of whether one is sufficiently communautaire to join the

[Sir Peter Hordern]

EMS. When one talks about being communautaire I always feel that that is best left to the prandialists. It is vital to our internal economic policy that we should now become a member of the EMS. I say that not from any particular enthusiasm for Europe, but because in recent times we have shed our ability to control our monetary aggregates internally and we now rely almost entirely on the interest rate to control inflation. We are placing too much weight on a rather slender instrument and we need the additional strength and resources which membership of the EMS could bring.

That important point is nowhere more important than in the current debate which appears to be taking place openly—I should like to say, behind the scenes—between the Prime Minister and other members of her Cabinet. We are not a member of the EMS—or, more accurately, we have no formal link with the deutschmark—because my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is against it. The reason is that her advisers feel that the turnover in the foreign exchange markets is far too high for our slender reserves. If we were members of the European monetary system, most of the speculation—most of the dealings are speculative—would disappear so long as there was credibility that we had a firm policy of alignment with the deutschmark. So that is not a good argument, although it is a natural apprehension to have.

There is also the argument that an interest rate differential would occur between the deutschmark and sterling, which the Germans would take advantage of. The only way in which they could do that would be to buy sterling in sufficient quantities. That would put up the price of sterling and then it would not be necessary to have such a high level of interest rates. So that argument is answered as well. There is also the possibility of a run on sterling that would leave us with no power to devalue.

I do not decry any of those reasons as being entirely wrong or illogical in themselves. They all contain much force, but they fall down in that they are essentially short-term negative lawyer-type considerations—it is the views of lawyers mixed with those of academic economists of the sort who write in that admirable journal produced by the Institute of Economic Affairs. The time to read that journal is on a very long, wet railway journey when one has run out of one's other newspapers.

It appears to me that those academic economists have more power than they are expected to have and than they properly should have. I am sorry that that should be so. It must come as a great surprise to them that anybody reads, let alone acts upon, their work. They appear to have extraordinary power to influence the course of events.

I regret that the good, common sense approach appears to be lacking. That is the approach adopted by business men. A business man would ask what the alternative would mean, if we remained outside the European monetary system. The European countries would get closer together in some form or other of European monetary union. That is inevitable. The question is whether we should do better to remain outside or within the European monetary system. In essence, that is the argument for membership of the European Community itself.

I any business man were asked what would happen in the European Community—the idea of a single European market commends itself—he would guess that in the long run there would be closer monetary union. If that is so, surely it is much better for us to be a part of it, a full member of it, rather than standing on the sidelines, criticising the operation of the European monetary system and insisting on having what we strongly call our independent sovereignty.

But in this issue, independent sovereignty means that we would be an offshore island of which little notice was taken by the European Community or still less by our old partners, the United States. What business would the United States have with a special relationship with an offshore island when there was a real community of nations to deal with in the European Community? So the present attitude, apparently held at the highest level, is mistaken and in the long run damaging to our interests. Therefore, I sincerely hope that it will change.

I do not believe that we shall have the luxury of selecting which bus we shall catch in future. It would be of great importance to us, for our own internal monetary discipline reasons, to align sterling with the deutschmark as soon as possible. For the wider reasons that I have given, we should catch that bus now and help to drive it.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) that it is a matter of some regret that the Foreign Secretary, having opening the debate, could not stay and hear some of the contributions on the Floor of the House. I understand how pressing the desire can be to share the evening with Mr. Wogan. If the Foreign Secretary's contribution on "Wogan" is as unconsciously amazing, amusing and entertaining as his contribution in the House, we shall see "Wogan" rocketing in the viewing ratings.

The only word to describe the speech by the Foreign Secretary is "incredible". He presented us with a veritable catalogue of victories that we had won in Europe on EEC funding over the past few years. I think that some of us can be forgiven for asking how it is that on EEC funding we seem to go from victory to victory to final defeat each and every year.

The Bill would be the latest of those defeats, the latest in a long line of mechanisms for attempting to finance the European Community. It addresses problems raised at Fontainebleau in 1984 and at various other summits over the past few years. The fundamental problems when we entered the Community many years ago are patently getting worse. It is obvious to most people and to most hon. Members that the minutiae of the Bill do little to conceal what is happening to the EEC budget. The Opposition have tabled a significant amendment to show that little has changed since Fontainebleau in 1984 and even since 1979. The fundamental imbalances, excesses and, some would say, almost iniquities of the EEC budget have worsened and there is little hope that anything that the Government have done or are likely to do will be of significance in changing that.

The problems addressed in 1984 at Fontainebleau and again today are nothing new and should elicit at least some frustration, if not embarrassment, from the Government Front Bench because the continuing excessive common agricultural policy spending, which seems to be on an almost inexorable rise under this Government, shows nothing less than incompetence. No one would pretend that the scandalous rise in agricultural spending and the under-allocation of the social and regional funds—all we have is promises—is anything new or unique to the Government. The problem goes to the heart of our membership of the EEC.

What is galling is the image presented by the Foreign Secretary, and by the Prime Minister on other occasions on her skirmishes in Brussels and elsewhere. We need little reminding of how many years the Prime Minister has had to fight Britain's case. We need little reminding of how many volumes of Churchillian rhetoric have been expended in attacking the EEC before she goes off to the various summits, which she presents as victories when she returns.

Of all the quotations from the Churchillian volumes, perhaps the one that describes best the Prime Minister's attitude to the EEC in practice is that she has been "resolute in her equivocation" over the EEC budget. If I were to paraphrase an ex-leader of the Labour party, it seems that the Prime Minister is prepared to "lose, lose and lose again" to preserve her antipathy towards the Common Market budget.

We need little reminding that as 1992 and the open market come upon us, we have hardly been able to shift the debate towards common sense in the Common Market. The Government have failed consistently to fight our case and win real concessions. How many years will it take for the Government to make real progress? Where do we stand today? We have a CAP budget which is out of control and a social and regional fund which is merely papering over the cracks of industrial decline and inner city decay in Britain.

The Government have constantly stood by and watched the worsening imbalance between revenue and expenditure which lies at the heart of the Community's financial mess. There are two causes of that imbalance —first, a failure of budget discipline controls to check excessive expenditure, especially on agriculture, and secondly, revenue ceilings, which the Court of Auditors believed were artificial and took insufficient account of the Community's financing needs.

The collapse of internal EEC financial control is scandalous. It is also scandalous that agricultural spending has increased two and a half times since Fontainebleau —not since the initial agreement when Britain joined the EEC, but since 1984. Many right hon. and hon. Members have already said that the waste must stop somewhere. When the treaty of Rome was signed in 1957, one in four of the working population of the then EEC was employed in agriculture. That is clearly not so now. Today the total working population involved in agriculture in the original six nations is down to about 5 per cent.; for the Community of Ten—before the accession of the Mediterranean countries—it is roughly 10 per cent.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) made a comparison of the amount spent by Britain on the EEC agricultural budget and the amount spent in Britain on the National Health Service. It is worth enlarging on that comparison, and to put the runaway agricultural spending in its grim perspective, we need look no further than the NHS. When the Government refuse to find £1 billion needed to get the NHS out of the current decline from which it is suffering so badly, they should remember the sickening immorality of the £11 billion a year that is spent solely on dumping, destroying and storing food surpluses within the EEC. Such spending must appear increasingly beyond the control of any democratic body. What have the Government done about that imbalance?

I notice that the Foreign Secretary has returned from addressing the masses through the medium of light entertainment. May I remind him of the fifth report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee on EEC finance, which was especially instructive on the imbalance? It shows that the gap between the regional and agricultural budgets is widening. The agricultural budget for 1986 amounted to two thirds of Community spending, while the regional fund amounted to 7·6 per cent. of total spending.

In a previous debate on this matter the Paymaster General pointed out something that he thought had gone unnoticed by me—the fact that the expansion of the social fund was agreed in Brussels by the European Council. But it was agreed as a prediction and promise, and those of us who are interested in the Common Market know that past promises and predictions from Ministers rarely bear much relationship to the reality of EEC funding.

During a sitting of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin), who spoke so eloquently tonight on the need for the extension of programmes on industrial, social and environmental matters, pressed the Paymaster General to come clean on the imbalance. She managed to extract from him the information that 72 per cent. of this year's budget will be for agricultural guaranteed expenditure, which represents an overall increase. The tone of that question and answer session must have been embarrassing for the Government. They seem to be taking steps in the wrong direction.

No matter how much the Government try to belittle the annual increase in agricultural spending, it is clear that each little step forward in agricultural spending is one huge leap backwards for Britain and the British economy's contribution to overall EEC spending. We cannot rely on the Government to reduce the CAP budget and it is also depressingly clear that that budget is on the increase and out of control.

The Chairman of the Select Committee put the matter succinctly to the Paymaster General and said that the House was "told some time ago . . . that the proportion on agriculture was going to go down, and that was the part of the original budgetary discipline package".

On that occasion, the Paymaster General had to admit —as the Government should admit to us today—that it is common knowledge and an embarrassment for Britain that the arrangements that were secured in 1984 to restrain agricultural spending were completely ineffective. That appears to be the real story behind the sabre rattling that accompanied the return of the Prime Minister from the Brussels meeting.

The Government are all talk and no action, just like the £7·9 million advertising circus surrounding 1992 and the open market. There is a worrying aspect to that advertising, because, although it is beneficial to alert the British public to the 1992 open market, the nature of the advertising is in grave danger of becoming the tip of a corrupt iceberg. The advertising for the open market and the advertising for the Department of Trade and Industry and the Scottish Office smooth over distinctions between the state, the Conservative party and the largest benefactors of the Conservative party, who are now appearing nightly on our television sets glorifying the free market. Ministers may smile, but those smiles may disappear when they realise that the smoothing over of the distinctions between the state and the Tory party appears to be worrying one or two other people.

Tonight I learnt that Mr. Alex Pagett, who left his job at the Scottish Office only three months ago to become the director of publicity for the Conservative party, has resigned his post. He has informed us that he is now going to work for the Reo Stakis organisation. I also understand that he informed the press that his decision is the result of his

"taking advantage of the enterprise culture".

Some of us suspect that he has found the blurring of distinction between the state and the Tory party too strong to take.

The Paymaster General told the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee that, this year, much effort has gone into reinforcing the 1984 arrangements. Why should we believe the Government when the financial forecast for CAP spending is that it will continue to increase in real terms by 2 per cent. per annum? We have been let down by the Government, not least because the corresponding loss to this country's declining regions and inner cities will be keenly felt while the farmers of France, Germany and Benelux will receive their usual annual boost.

How can anyone deny the stark contrast between the House of Commons agreeing to increase, once again, the massive subsidies to inefficient French farmers and the fact that I have to go back to my constituency and to the county of Lanarkshire, where the steel men and the steel mills, particularly Ravenscraig, are breaking record after record, heightening efficiency, increasing output and delivering quality goods on time, and tell them that, although there is a threat over their heads, the Government cannot and will not find the money even to convince the British Steel Corporation that it has a right to survive on its record.

That same Government, however, can find money by the barrelload to plough into Europe's inefficient agricultural sector. That contrast is so stark as almost to boggle the imagination. The Government cannot expect anyone to swallow that. They must break out of the dogmatic straitjacket that has suppressed and guided their previous actions on Europe.

We need a certain pessimism of the intellect when we study the Government's past actions. We need also some optimism of will, which the Government seem incapable of achieving. It is possible to make a leap of the imagination and to define measures that could be taken within the EEC that would assist Britain and the rest of Europe to overcome some of our greatest industrial and financial problems.

Some comments and criticisms have been levelled at Mr. Delors, and we need not accept everything that Mr. Delors says. For example, he said recently that he looked forward to a European Government in 10 years' time. However, there are many developments for which he has been fighting which we could usefully take on board as being beneficial to Britain. He has called for a social market, including the opening of the books by, and industrial democracy within, European big business. He has proposed new rights for European trade unionists, an increased budget share for social spending and a European recovery programme, all of which would be suitably enhanced if the Government were to direct their attention to them.

These proposals are opposed by the British Government, but not by the other member state Governments. The British Government are committed to deregulation in Europe on a scale that has not been supported even by Chancellor Kohl.

The message to the Government should be that co-operation does not necessarily imply integration. A co-ordination of effort by sovereign states on a European scale does not necessarily imply the undermining of national sovereignty. Indeed, if it is to be a co-operative approach rather than an integrated one, the national sovereignty of the states involved could be reinforced.

The Labour party has made it clear that it would take such initiatives and stop the trend of budget allocation being decided at the centre. A Labour Government would be involved in co-operative and co-ordinated efforts.

Once more, we have been asked to acquiesce in a failure by the Government to secure reasonable terms for Britain. They have failed to show sufficient imagination in approaching the problem. This is a failure for Britain's industrial and social base and for the future of the EEC.

8.3 pm

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): The hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) began his speech with a few good-natured digs at my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary for leaving the Chamber to appear on the Terry Wogan show this evening. I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend delighted his viewing audience of millions. I am only sorry that some of us were unable to see him and enjoy an interesting experience.

Those of us who have sat through four and a half hours of this debate have had a remarkably interesting time, too. From whatever viewpoint a speech has been made, there has been a sense that this debate takes place at a time that amounts to something of a watershed in the affairs of Europe. It is no ordinary Bill that we are debating. It is no run-of-the-mill piece of EEC legisation, even though my right hon. and learned Friend sought to present it as a routine measure, suggesting that everything in the garden was rosy and successful.

The Bill is a significant revision of the EEC fundamental treaty rules. It gives the House an important opportunity to take a real decision on the hitherto highly unsatisfactory spending arrangements of the Community. It should be said at the outset by way of warning that our scope as a Parliament for taking such decisions in future may be extremely limited if some Euro-enthusiasts get their way.

As several hon. Members have warned, the debate is taking place against a background of much arrogant muscle-flexing by the EEC, especially by the Commission's President, Mr. Delors, who has emerged as the villain of the piece, according to many of those who have contributed to the debate. I see Mr. Delors in that role. He appears to be assuming the mantle of a latter-day Louis XIV, complete with a spending record that displays a consistently extravagant folie de grandeur. Some of his speeches embody the Sun King's notorious dictum, "L'etat c'est moi." We have heard repeatedly——

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend agree that he might add to these famous epigrams, "Apres moi, Delors."?

Mr. Aitken: I hesitate to contribute further to this game of French quotations. There has been a deluge of criticism this evening and it is apres that that I am speaking.

Criticism has been rightly directed to the remarks of Mr. Delors. Many hon. Friends, including the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), have referred to Mr. Delors' speech in which he said that within 10 years 80 per cent. of legislation in economic and social areas will be taken from the House of Commons and put under the control of European institutions. That gauntlet having been thrown down, many parliamentarians, quite rightly, would wish to take it up.

Whether we share Mr. Delors's vision or whether we do not, it is certain that the EEC juggernaut is rolling in the direction that he is suggesting. If he and his fellow visionaries have their way, in 10 years this House will be no more than a glorified county council. It is certain that there would be a massive erosion of sovereignty. It would mean the loss to our Parliament of even the minimal controls on EEC expenditure that we are debating this evening. We must see the EEC treaty revision that is enshrined in the Bill not as a small rule change, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary tried to present it, but as representing an important preliminary battle in the coming political war of survival, in which the issue will be whether to surrender to Euro-federalism or to retain the independence of member nation states and their national legislatures.

From the big picture, I turn to some of the details of the Bill. One of the most worrying aspects of the Bill is the contrast between the tight way in which we control the spending of taxpayers' money at home and the loose rein that we are giving to the EEC to spend the same taxpayers' money on our behalf in Europe.

Almost every nook and cranny of public spending in Britain has felt the threat, and sometimes the lash, of Thatcherite discipline, and rightly, too. District council treasurers, hospital administrators, DHSS managers—almost everyone in a public responsible position—have learnt to live with cash limits, budgetary restraints, ceilings, cappings and all the other instruments of Treasury torture that are handed down from the modern Court of the Star Chamber.

This smack of firm Government has not been felt on the bottoms of the EEC bureaucrats. The big spenders of Brussels must feel that they are living in the court of King Midas. Whenever they have touched a budget limit in the past, even a so-called legally binding one, it has exploded into an El Dorado of overspending.

Let us consider the figures that lie behind the Bill. Under the IGA, the United Kingdom taxpayer has to start by coughing up £765 million to pay for past EEC overspending. Perhaps what is past is past; there is no point in crying over spilt wine lakes today. But will overspending stop with this legislation? I think that the case for pessimism is much more convincing than that for optimism. For a start, they have mighty generous budgets over there in the EEC. At home, Ministers go before the Court of the Star Chamber——

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): The hon. Gentleman has been stressing the amount of money that we pay into the EEC budget. What percentage of our gross national product do we pay into that budget?

Mr. Aitken: I am coming to that. It is a somewhat misleading figure. In measurable terms, we were paying 1·4 per cent. of VAT, and we are now paying 1·9 per cent. That is a more measurable statistic than the GNP statistic, which I shall come to later.

There is a great contrast here at home with our Ministers appearing before our domestic Court of the Star Chamber, cap in hand, to try to get an extra 4 per cent., 5 per cent., or, if they are really lucky, 5·5 per cent. increase for their domestic budgets. But the European Parliament has recently approved an increase in the EEC budget of 20 per cent. The Bill envisages an increase in EEC resources of 25 per cent.

The only good thing to be said about that is that it is only half as much as Mr. Delors wanted for the own resources ceiling. He wanted an increase in own resources of 50 per cent., which is equivalent to 2·3 per cent. of VAT. The awful thing is that I expect that he will get it by one method or another in the foreseeable future. After all, we were told that the 1·4 per cent. limit would be unbreakable. There is spirit over there in the EEC—in the words of the late Mr. Wilfred Pickles—of, "Give him the money, Mabel."

Every Commission seems to be able to get out of national Governments more and more money by all sorts of methods, some of which have been no more than conjuring tricks in creative accountancy. Those tricks and devices have many labels—the negative reserve, the reimbursable advance and the carryover. Tonight we heard about the 10-month metric year that has been invented to give a favourable statistical comparison with the previous 14-month year.

The new conjuring trick is that, instead of an own resources limit of 1·4 per cent. of VAT, which is upgraded to at least a measurable 1·9 per cent., we have something called the fourth resource, which is a levy of 1·2 per cent. on the gross national product of member states. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) said, the trouble with the fourth resource is that the GNP calculations are notoriously difficult to measure. Even in the United Kingdom there are different ways of calculating it—the income method and the expenditure method—and after reading the EEC draft directive, I have grave doubts whether the statistical basis of the Greek or Italian GNP take into account the black economy and whether we are using the same methods of comparison.

The fourth resource is a recipe for obscurity, and obscurity in financial figures is usually the mother of indiscipline. That is a worrying aspect of the calculations on which we are asked to base our approval of this measure.

The message from the Foreign Secretary was, "Do not worry, this time we really have the big spenders under control, because their spending limits are legally enforceable." We have had legally enforceable limits before. They were enforceable by the Council of Ministers, which did not take a blind bit of notice, so the limits were never enforced, and spending soared. On this occasion, we have heard the Foreign Secretary say that the spending conrols will be written into the regulations, thus making the budgetary limits strictly legally enforceable. That phrase is somewhat contradictory, because the European Court has no penal sanctions with which to enforce them.

However, it sounds good—at least until we look at the small print. As I said in my intervention to my right hon. and learned Friend, the categories of EEC expenditure, broken down between obligatory and non-obligatory expenditure, are not on the same basis when it comes to those legally enforceable limits. Whereas obligatory expenditure is covered by the regulations, which are pretty generous, allowing agriculture to grow by 74 per cent. of Community GNP—which seems extremely generous to those who believe that agriculture has grown quite enough—the non-obligatory expenditure category is not covered by legally binding regulations.

The budgetary discipline for the non-obligatory expenditure category depends not on law, but on what are called "inter-institutional discussions" among the European Council, the Commission and Parliament. Those inter-institutional discussions sound like one of the softest touches known to political life. Imagine Zorba, Jacques and Franz all going off to have lunch together and having an instant inter-institutional discussion on whether to have potato soup or caviare. I bet that they will end up buying the caviare.

On the basis of the track record, who really believes that those inter-institutional discussions will mean more firm and effective spending limits for our taxpayers? The whole culture and thinking of the European Community these days is focused not on budgetary discipline, but on dreams of glory, of federalism, of 1992 and all that. The much more prosaic but essential requirements, such as spending controls, are being brushed aside as the grand designs for the future political state of Europe take priority.

I make no apology for returning to the need to envisage the Bill in the context of the coming struggle between national sovereignty and Euro federalism. Apart from the futuristic pronouncements of Mr. Delors in favour of a European Government, we already have contemporary and concrete proposals on the table for a European central bank, a European common currency and a European economic and monetary union. There are even discussion papers circulating in the Commission with ideas on how to introduce a common system of direct European taxation. If those plans are anything like the experience of direct European expenditure, they are not likely to be beneficial to the British taxpayer and the British public, and they will put our Chancellor of the Exchequer out of a job.

Before we vote on the legislation, which substantially amends the EEC treaty rules on expenditure, we must pause and reflect for a moment on the direction in which we are being led. In the history of the American wild west, there used to be a legendary bar known as the Last Chance saloon. I believe that that establishment was traditionally located on the edge of the frontier where the good and bad guys mingled together before going out to fight over how the west was going to be won and by whom. We are now in or close to the Last Chance saloon of the European future.

As a sovereign Parliament, very soon we must decide whether we will slither into President Delors' vision of a federal Europe, with all the financial and legislative laxity that that implies, or whether we will take a stand and fight for our national sovereignty, for the rights of our national Parliament and, on the positive side, for a different vision of Europe. The one that I prefer is General De Gaulle's "Europe des Patries".

That Gaullist vision of a Europe of independent nation states is enshrined in the person of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I have the greatest confidence in my right hon. Friend's ability to resist the worst of the current EEC proposals leading us down the primrose path of Euro-federalism. Despite some signs to the contrary, my right hon. Friend has not yet been conclusively proved to be either invincible or immortal, so her fine words and instincts need to be backed up by parliamentary action and support.

Small in number though we may be in the Division Lobby, some of my hon. Friends are determined to sound the tocsin of alarm about the rising tide of federalism in Europe. A vital factor in reasserting some national parliamentary resistance to the federal big thinkers and big spenders is the retention of effective levers of control on EEC spending. Those effective levers of control are lamentably absent from the legislation, and that is why I shall vote against a Second Reading for the Bill.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): I shall preface my remarks by mentioning some of the constitutional issues that seem to have played a great part in the debate—the lament about the loss of sovereignty through our membership of the European Community.

The problem is far wider than the effect on our constitutional processes since we became a member of the European Community. It is the far more fundamental one of the roles of the Executive and the legislature. Conservative Members who complain about the European Community must examine the roles of the legislature and the Executive as they have developed especially in the past decade, when measure after measure has been steam-rollered through without much opportunity being given for the real will of the House to be heard.

I dare say that not a single word of any of these agreements will be changed as a result of this debate or any of the debates that we shall have when we go into a Committee of the whole House. Conservative Members should think about that. We have become puppets of the Executive, who pull the strings as they desire and bring us agreements that have been made in secret, which they have no intention of changing, and which they want us to rubber-stamp. I look forward to the opportunity in Committee to try to make some major changes.

There is a reference in paragraph 3(iii) of the explanatory and financial memorandum of the Bill to a new fourth resource. Do the Government accept that, if the House agrees, it should be deleted from the Council's decision of 24 June? Why do the Government feel that a fourth resource is needed? Do they believe that the budgetary agreements on discipline will not hold and that this safety net will enable them to provide more finance for the Community without having to return to the House and suffer embarrassment here? How large a part of the budget will the new fourth resource be? Will it be 1 per cent., 2 per cent., or 10 per cent.? Or might it be 20 per cent. of revenue? The Government do not have much idea, but they probably inserted the proviso to overcome any future problems over budgetary indiscipline.

We are told that the intergovernmental agreement provides for contributions to a monetary reserve, but that such contributions would be triggered only if the dollar depreciated against the ecu. Only last week we were told by the venerable scribes who write in The Economist that that is likely to happen. They forecast that, because interest rates in America are coming into line with world interest rates and because of the uncertainty caused by the presidential elections, the dollar's rally is likely to be short-lived. They predict that over the next 12 months the dollar will touch new lows against the yen and sterling. It will not necessarily depreciate against the deutschmark, but it might still depreciate against the ecu. Any substantial downward movement in the dollar will affect the amount of money that we spend on the common agricultural policy.

The Foreign Secretary nailed the Government's flag to the mast of the Single European Act and to the budgetary agreement. According to the Commission's preliminary draft general budget, which has the title "General picture", the Single European Act will strengthen the Community's decision-making capacity and will set several fundamental goals. The first is "the completion of a large internal market by 1992."

The Government are well and truly committed to that goal. It has been rammed down our throats in glossy television advertising every night of the week. However, whenever we ask the Government what they think the impact of the internal market will be on employment in the regions, the Government say that they are encouraging business men everywhere to grasp this opportunity, that they expect extra jobs to be created in the United Kingdom but that there is no way of telling what will happen in the regions and that they do not intend even to attempt to find out.

In the light of the way in which the Common Market has developed, the regions are likely to suffer from the creation of the internal market. A minority of high-tech companies are located in the regions. The Japanese factories in south Wales will no doubt prosper, but the distribution of high-tech companies cannot be better illustrated than by a Hewlett Packard advertisement that appeared in several newspapers during the past fortnight. Hewlett Packard claims that it covers the nation with its high-tech services. It has 19 centres in the south-east. In Wales it has one, and in the north it has two. That is the kind of involvement that the regions have in high-tech industries. The Government are committed to the internal market, but they are not committed to employment in the regions.

The second goal provided for in the Single European Act is "greater economic and social cohesion between the Member States."

However, the United Kingdom Government have been doing exactly the opposite. There is no greater economic and social cohesion between the constituent parts of the United Kingdom. There are great disparities. The wealth gap and the employment gap are growing all the time, to the detriment of the regions.

The third goal is

"speeding up the development of a common policy on research."

The Government have had to be dragged, kicking and screaming, into supporting European Community research programmes, which in financial terms are chickenfeed.

The fourth goal is the "development of social policy, monetary integration and environment policy."

However, the Government have been hopelessly dragging their feet over all those aims. Because of their failure properly to apply the equal opportunities directives, they have been taken to the European Court on several occasions. They have blocked the parental leave directive. They helped to torpedo the famous Vredeling directive that would have allowed for greater consultation with workers if there were major changes in the company's activities, or if it was proposed to close it.

Whatever we may think of monetary integration, we know that the Government want no part of it. They have declared their opposition to joining the European monetary system and the creation of a European central bank. The Prime Minister continues to refuse to countenance the United Kingdom joining the EMS. The Government have reluctantly agreed to implement the directives on bath water and tap water quality, on sulphur emissions from large industrial plants, on lead in petrol and on the ozone layer only after immense pressure from other member states.

The Government do not support the proposal to alter the basis of the European Community's revenue. It was amazing to hear the Foreign Secretary speak about the Government's consistent approach to the structural funds. When the Prime Minister reported to the House on 8 December 1987 after the European Council meeting in Copenhagen, she said:

"On the second aspect, structural funds, the Commission had proposed a doubling of the resources devoted to those funds by 1992 . . . I made it clear that this was out of the question."—[Official Report, 8 December 1987; Vol. 124, c. 167]

A few months later, an agreement was signed that will lead to an 80 per cent. increase in real terms by 1992. By 1993 there will be a doubling of the structural funds.

I welcome the Prime Minister's conversion to a regional policy for the European Community. What worries me is how Britain will benefit from a doubling of the structural funds. We know that in all likelihood 80 per cent. of the regional fund will go to the southern states and only 20 per cent. to the north. On the basis of the projected figures for 1992, that will mean about £2·6 billion at the very most being available to help in priority two assistance for helping traditional industrial regions suffering from major job losses. Even if we receive one third of that money, we will be lucky to get the £1 billion that the Prime Minister said at one time she hoped we would get.

The Government themselves have already halved the amount of money available for regional policies in the United Kingdom and there is a real possibility that the Government will reduce that figure even further. The regional fund contributions are on a shared basis, and there must be a commitment by the Government as well as from the Community. Even if that money were available to us, I foresee that our own spending on regional policy may be insufficient to enable us to take up all the available money. I shall be interested to know whether the Government have considered the possibility of that imbalance occurring in the future.

[Mr. Win Griffiths]

I fully endorse the Opposition's amendment, and I hope that it will receive the support of Conservative dissidents who are unhappy about the way in which their Government are moving. However, from the tenor of their remarks, I gather that they would prefer to put up some kind of iron curtain around the United Kingdom anyway.

We need to underline the fact that the Bill will lead to a major increase in Community spending that is likely to find its way, without much diminution, into the agricultural sector, leaving the very real needs of Britain's industrial areas not being met. If the Government want to see Community spending increase, they must ensure that the balance is more towards that part of the budget that is described as non-compulsory expenditure.

8.32 pm

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): It was inevitable that this debate would take on the tones of a constitutional argument, yet that is to disfigure it. We are not facing a choice between nationalism and federalism in the European Community. We signed a treaty, the first indent of which stated that its signatories are "Determined to lay the foundations of an ever-closer union among the people of Europe."

Both the Conservative and Labour Governments spent many years travelling around Europe getting the right to sign that treaty. What is now happening flows from it. It is true that in Britain we have often made the mistake of pretending that there is a distinction to be made between economic and political development; as if one could have greater economic integration without concomitant political moves as well. Perhaps that is catching up with us.

Tonight, we should be debating the Community's practicalities, recognising that in heading for the 1992 target, we are saying that we shall let the market be the motor. Well, the market may well lead us into directions that entail political decision-making. It may be that we shall move more in the direction of pooling our political activity, but to argue that it is a question of sovereignty against federalism is to be a generation behind the debate.

I pay tribute to those hon. Members who have tonight made emotional speeches, many of which have been tours de force. However, they have said nothing to me intellectually, because they have not offered any vision of where we will take this island—I yield to nobody in being proud of being born a Briton in these islands—when we have a few miles away a continent that is undergoing the process of political and economic unification. That is the strategic context in which tonight's debate must be placed.

I wonder whether the Opposition will divide the House, because I noted that the Leader of the Opposition wrote recently to the European Parliament's Socialist groups subscribing to the notion of a common manifesto for the next European elections a year from now. It has also been observed that almost all the European Parliament's Socialist groups have endorsed the deal from Brussels. I fail to see how the Labour party can square its adherance to the notion of a common manifesto with its opposition to the measures that underpin it.

Mr. Holland: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman would like my reply to that point now or later.

Mr. Curry: Let us hear it now.

Mr. Holland: Then I can tell the House that my intervention will take some time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Interventions must be kept fairly brief.

Mr. Holland: That is why, Madam Deputy Speaker, I suggest that the hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) stays for the end of the debate.

Mr. Curry: I look forward with keen anticipation to the hon. Gentleman's reply, and I am happy that he has given himself time to work it out.

In judging the measures that are before the House, we should not look for an absolute and perfect solution, because all of us know that such is not likely to present itself. We are all rather tired of talking about the Community in terms of absolutes. It is not that kind of organisation. Instead, we need to know whether the Brussels deal is materially better than that which went before it. First, will there be a discipline in farm spending? Secondly, will it offer the Community a period of stability and an end to what seem to be interminable demands for yet more emergency funding? Thirdly, is it a good deal for the United Kingdom? Finally, is it a good deal for the whole of the Community, in the sense that it will open the way to those developments that have been endorsed, promoted and demanded by the United Kingdom? I believe that we can make a positive response on all those counts.

The Brussels deal plugs the deficiencies of Fontainebleau, and we must be honest and admit that it did have deficiencies. Also, it introduces medium-term planned expenditure, and the inter-institutional agreement deserves rather more credit than it has been given tonight. It also reinforces the rebate mechanism and improves upon it in certain respects. It also opens the way to 1992, by establishing the political balance—which is where the increase in the structural funds comes—that will clear the way for decision-making towards that goal.

What were the faults of the Fontainebleau agreement? It was not legally binding on the European Council or on the Commission. There was nothing to prevent the Commission from making proposals that contravened Fontainebleau's guidelines. Finally, it was not translated into specific and binding controls on the individual agricultural support programmes.

The Brussels deal provides legally and formally binding control over agricultural expenditure, because the Brussels commitments had to be passed into legislative texts, which went their course through the European Parliament and Council and were then legislated into existence during the course of last month. They both fix an overall limit on farm spending and define it as a percentage of the growth in Community resources. Those provisions are in texts that can only be overcome by a unanimous vote of the Council, and there is no organisation in the world that will bind itself in all circumstances whatsoever and not leave the possibility of unanimity changing the situation.

Whereas Fontainebleau was riddled with special circumstances, the Brussels deal permits the single special circumstances of the dollar-ecu relationship. It does so both ways. If the dollar starts to rise—the recent pressure on the dollar has been upwards—those economies are realised, just as, if the dollar declines, the funding will be made available, I recommend that the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) reads the text, where he will find that provision. Secondly, the Commission must never make proposals exceeding the guideline. Thirdly, we have in the agricultural regimes about 20 specific measures for legally bound stabilisers.

It is easy enough to say that this is nothing but yet another rerun of Fontainebleau. The fact is that it is a radically different animal. Let us not denigrate Fontainebleau: it laid the basis for our rebate arrangements, and they came under intense pressure. It is difficult to exaggerate the unpopularity of the rebate provision at the time, but they have now been reinforced and enhanced by the Brussels agreement. Fontainebleau was a milestone along the road, although it did not provide the certainties for which many hoped at the time.

Will the arrangement work? That is a perfectly legitimate question. I have been examining some of the agricultural sums for this year. In this year's farm price review, we have had a Council compromise, which is still hanging on the Greek distinction between points and percentages in monetary compensatory amounts, and which added 289 million ecu to the cost. That has been entirely compensated for by reduced aid for incorporation of skimmed milk powder, for milk to be fed as a liquid to calves and for liquid to be used for casein manufacture, and by savings in export subsidy. The total savings are 285 million ecu.

The Ministers went into the negotiations saying that they would chop the green rate and play on the level playing field. What happened? They were told, "No." As a result the changes in the green rate are deferred until next year. They could not drive a coach and horses through the settlement as they had done in the past.

Let me make a forecast for next year: I think that it will be impossible to spend the money in the agricultural guideline. I think that we will end up 1 billion ecu in the black in both 1989 and 1990. We have a 350 million ecu margin in the preliminary draft budget before we reach the guideline; the slight increase in inflation in the Community gives us another 50 million ecu to play with; the savings in the dairy sector are substantial; and the drought in the United States will have a dramatic impact on the amount that we need to subsidise production of oilseed rape and soya, and on the lower restitutions on the cereal harvest.

That extra 1 billion ecu will permit the full depreciation of stocks and, if it is what Ministers want, the dismantling of MCAs. The importance of such an automatic depreciation is difficult to exaggerate. It introduces a step of budgetary integrity that did not exist in the past. The overvalued stock represents a disfigurement of the budget, and that is now being tackled.

We can argue that the CAP is now palpably coming into balance, albeit slowly. There is no skim milk powder to be had. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary gave figures for stocks at 1 April. A telephone call to Brussels would have obtained the figures for 30 June, which show that there is no skim milk powder to be had, and that the butter stocks, which peaked at 1·4 million tonnes in 1986 and were 1·18 million tonnes a year ago, stood on 30 June at 378,339 tonnes. That is a very significant decline. What is important is that that is not reaccumulating: it is not going into stock now. It is a net decrease in the level of stocks.

There is a good argument for saying that, although some sectors remain difficult, the general shape of the CAP is very different from that of five years ago. I invite those who regard quotas as merely a tinkering with the system to visit my constituency—a dairy-producing area with many small farmers—and to propose their thesis in front of the Craven tenant farmers association. I should like them to see what response they would receive.

The second important gain has been what can only be described as the medium-term expenditure plan incorporated in the inter-institutional agreement, which limits expenditure on a scale to 1992. Many hon. Members have said that that means that there is no budgetary discipline in the non-obligatory sector. Having lived through the negotiations with the committees of the European Parliament that wish to spend the money and having told them that the limits that were now to be enforced, I believe that there is an effective discipline, although it is different from that in the obligatory sector. It is worth noting that the only part of the non-obligatory sector in which there is any prospect of significant expansion is research. That line in the budget is the most favourable to the United Kingdom.

The third gain is the rebate, which has been safeguarded. That was by no means an obvious achievement. It has been taken outside the framework of the budget, which gets us away from the difficult problem of the "dead money" that the rebate imposes on the budget. The gross national product scheme will benefit the United Kingdom, possibly to the tune of 500 million ecu a year.

In a sense the most important criterion is whether the deal relaunches the Community as a growing and dynamic concern. There is striking evidence from the past six months that it does. We have had the agreements on capital movements, road haulage, the mutual recognition of diplomas and the controls on large combustion plants. The Community will always go in fits and starts; we shall never achieve a great consistent movement. The history of presidencies shows that each tends to start as a period of stagnation, with a great rush towards the end. I do not think that there is anything wrong with that. I feel that we have political lift-off, and commercial lift-off as well.

I invite hon. Members to read the Financial Times day by day and to note the extent to which industry is positioning itself ahead of its 1992 market. The 1992 objective is a British objective. We claim that we invented it. But the Community is enlarging the horizon as it emerges as a world power. It has always been a world power waiting to be invented: now it is taking material shape. We see that in the reactions to the Reagan-Gorbachev detente on security measures, which imposes on the Community the heavy political burden of demonstrating its capacity for unity.

The states of eastern Europe are now queuing up for Community recognition. How long will it be before Mr. Gorbachev pays a visit to the Commission headquarters in Brussels, and until the President of the Council goes to Moscow? We have already seen the first agreement signed with Hungary. The frontiers of the Community are, in a sense, extending towards the East. The Community is alereadly an economic magnet to those countries. Already we begin to see the new candidate states lining up. In Norway, Austria and even Switzerland, politicians are asking, "What is the relationship with that greater Community? Can we not be a member of it?"

A politically strong Community, competent to handle its worldwide relations as an ally of the United States, is a major British objective. What would happen if we said no —for the House could vote against the measure? First, we would continue the long period of disunity and internal warfare that has so characterised the Community, just when we most need to present a united visage to the world. I apologise for the French: the word means "face".

Mr. Holland: I om abliged to the hon. Gentleman for giving way to me, but, first, I do not need lessons in French, and secondly, several hon. Members still wish to intervene, although we have postponed the wind-up.

Mr. Curry: I am drawing to a conclusion. The hon. Gentleman will know that I have sat through every second of the debate.

Secondly, we would throw away our gains in budget discipline—the rebate and expenditure control. Thirdly, we would dislocate the whole movement towards 1992. The rest of Europe will not say, "What are we going to do to accommodate the British? How can we get round the problem?" They will not come galloping to us when they have just agreed one of the most difficult political compromises in the history of the European Community. The damage would be done to British objectives.

We are no longer behind the rest of the train. We have caught up through our efforts and our negotiating skills in Brussels. This marks a new stage in Britain's full, sensible and pragmatic participation in the development of the Community, and I commend it to the House. It is part of my vision of the future.

8.50 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I hope to catch Mr. Speaker's eye on Wednesday in the debate on short speeches, so I shall just ask six questions, five of which are friendly and may be answered by letter.

First, the Foreign Secretary spoke with approval about the reduction of stocks—beating ploughshares into golf clubs, as he put it. That has something to be said for it, except that we have all seen the dramatic pictures from Iowa and Nebraska. What is the Government's estimate of the effect of the American bread-basket weather conditions on policy towards European stocks?

The second question concerns European action on the environment, about which my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) quite properly asked. When reducing stocks, is there any policy of increasing habitats that might well be put to other uses? I think in particular of the wetlands and of the dramatic figures published only last week by the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds showing the likely decline and possible elimination of many European species. Has that been taken into account in policy-making?

I am glad to see the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science here. Last Thursday week we had an interesting debate in Committee during which the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs spelt out policy on the ozone layer and on chlorofluorocarbons. I pay tribute to the work that has been done by British civil servants in the Foreign Office, who are internationally distinguished and who have a great reputation in Europe and around the world for their expertise on the Antarctic. In answer to a specific question the Prime Minister replied that the Secretary of State for the Environment was the lead Minister in all matters relating to the ozone layer. The problem of the Arctic and the Antarctic should be handled on a European basis. Are the Government coming around to that view?

A third matter that should be handled on a European basis—if it is not, we shall not have much effect—has to do with the rain forests. It is no good turning around to the Brazilians, the Indonesians and Laotians—my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) knows a great deal about this—and telling them that the responsibility is entirely theirs. It is an international responsibility and a matter of self-interest. Is it Government policy that this should be dealt with on a European rather than a British basis?

My third question is much shorter. The Under-Secretary will remember this from a previous incarnation when he was responsible for these matters as a Minister of the Department of Education and Science, and I believe he has a continuing interest in the issue. Clause 8 of the Bill contains a great deal of money. What is the policy towards Ispra and Karlsruhe and the other European institutions that we have debated but about which no final decision has been reached? There are certain tasks that are probably better performed on a European basis if the institutions function properly. One such task is waste management and the storage of toxic waste. For example, all the toxic waste arriving at the mouth of the Mersey creates enormous problems. Surely it would be rational to deal with that on a European basis?

Fourthly, what is the policy towards setting aside money for a disaster fund? When I was a Member of the European Parliament I was also a member of the budget sub-committee which was responsible for going to Friuli after the earthquake. I was impressed by what the Commission did. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science will recall the disaster from his days as assistant to Sir Christopher Soames. At any rate in the early stages, the Commission did an extremely good job, whatever happened later on.

Should not disaster operations come more and more to be done on a European basis? I am consumed by constituency problems arising from the Piper Alpha disaster, which was extremely harrowing for all concerned. Should not oil slicks, for instance, be a matter for European action rather than action by those whose rivers are most affected?

Fifthly, as an NUR-sponsored hon. Member I ask again about policies on customs. We have trains travelling at 47 miles an hour; the French trains travel at 165 in the Pas de Calais. An all-party Channel tunnel visit takes place tomorrow and as a member of it I shall know a little more in 24 hours' time, but the briefing that NUR sponsors had from Sir Robert Reid fills us with alarm. Someone must tell the Home Office to get its act together. I believe that the Department of Transport is doing its best, but Scotland and the north of England must not be disadvantaged by inflexibility of the customs.

My final question will be received less well. At the Hanover and Toronto summits we saw pictures of the Prime Minister. In Hanover, we saw her going up the Herrenhausen steps—that beautiful palace of Hanover—flanked as usual by Mr. Charles Powell. If Mr. Powell was so inefficient at the crucial time in January 1986 that he failed to tell his Prime Minister anything about what she should know about the role of the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, how is it that he remains such a crucial and powerful foreign policy adviser in the tradition of Sir Horace Wilson? I surmise from the chuckles of Ministers that they know exactly what I am on about, thereby giving the game away. Enough said.

8.57 pm

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): Of the many speeches by Conservative Members I noted two in particular with some sadness. My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) got stuck on his worries about sovereignty—rather painfully stuck in the swing doors of the Last Chance saloon to which he referred.

I also noted the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen), which I felt was notable for its wit, style and complete lack of facts. He addressed the central problem of whether we Conservatives want the Community and are prepared to take the consequential decisions arising from our membership of it. Those of us who believe that what the Government have achieved with the Community partners is to be lauded are not uninterested in the control of expenditure. I wish that debates on other areas of Government expenditure were treated with the same enthusiasm, pound for pound, when we scrutinise parts of our domestic budget.

It is not surprising that the European Community budget has grown. After all, we are now in a Community of 12 member states and 320 million people. The budget, even this year after the increases, is approximately £29 billion. In relative terms, that is nearly one fifth of the United Kingdom budget. If we look at it another way, we see that our contribution to the EC budget is running at about 1 per cent. of the total United Kingdom budget.

These are vital sums and it is important that we control them. I ask hon. Members to review them in the context of the Community that we are trying to build and the benefits that we have derived from it. The Community is leading us towards a single market, which is very much Government policy, and I suspect that it will have to be part of the policy of the Opposition if they go as far as signing the common manifesto about which my hon. Friend the Member for Shipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) spoke. Therefore, it is not so much the magnitude of the budget that we should be discussing as the discipline required to control it and the direction that the expenditure has now taken.

The Brussels summit in February was a notable success and showed the strength of the negotiations led by the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary. What did it achieve, and what are we considering? It achieved a degree of budget discipline which has not before been practised within the Community and led to a control of the common agricultural policy which has not previously been seen in the Community. It led to a shift in balance in the budget progressively away from agriculture, and that also has not previously been seen in the Community. It retained the Fontainebleau agreement and our abatement system which is of such great importance to us.

The concept of legally binding expenditure is written into the agreement. I endorse what was said earlier. This is a new departure. There was nothing comparable in the Fontainebleau agreement. That is why we are effectively amending the treaty of Rome, an order of magnitude which gives strength to the nature of the agreements and their legally binding character.

Perhaps the Paymaster General will go a little further into the ways in which Britain will ensure that those legally binding measures are enacted. How will the legal options be used and what recourse will he consider having to the Court of Justice if there is a variation? Greater understanding here of the procedures would lead to a great deal more confidence about the nature of the agreements that have been reached.

Budget discipline will also be helped by other factors in the Community, not least that France has become a net contributor to total funds. For example, if we look at the intergovernmental agreement that we are being asked to approve and at the order of magnitude of this year's contributions, we find that West Germany will contribute £1·16 billion, France £967 million and the United Kingdom £741 million. However, the United Kingdom position is even more favourable than that.

The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) did not give way to me earlier. If he had, I would have advised him that the IGA figure that we are discussing is an advance on own resources. We shall receive additional receipts as a consequence and,, of course, the differential amount will be treated under the abatement procedure. The arrangement is of great benefit to Britain.

As I have said, under own resources the United Kingdom's gross contribution to the Community is little more than 1 per cent. of GNP after abatement, and that is well below the contribution of the other member states. Having secured our relatively favourable position, we find that the toal agreement derived from the Brussels summit has established the revised basis of own resources in the Community. It enshrines the reform of accounting practice, such as the ending of the old hoary accounting measures that are used to distort figures, such as the carry forward of unused budget appropriations and negative reserves. It has enforced budgetary discipline, especially in agriculture, by way of the guideline limits and the removal of exceptional circumstances through which under previous agreements the Commission regularly drove a coach and horses. It has established price proposals in the guidelines and automatic stabilisers and new rules for depreciation and treatment of agricultural stock.

The results are a signal success for the Government. They show that when the Government give leadership in the Community they win support and are able to make significant progress and major changes. We are now talking about major changes in the budget and the common agricultural policy.

Through our leadership we have encouraged the other countries in the Community to abolish capital controls on a phased basis. That is a remarkable event, which has not received sufficient appreciation in the House. The French Minister, in particular, has already acknowledged that the cost to France in 1990 of removing capital controls and liberalising exchange controls could be a net outflow of 200 billion francs, but he is still prepared to take the measure in the interests of moving the Community forward. We cannot have a single market with the capital controls that currently exist in member states other than Britain.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) that the problem is that this country so often treats the European Community in a half-hearted way. We are in, but we are not terribly enthusiastic. However, I urge the Government to build on their successes at Brussels and Hanover, to take advantage of the agreements that are now to be ratified throughout the Community and to get stuck in and assume a proper leading role within the community.

That will entail our deciding how the EMS is developed by becoming a member of the exchange rate mechanism. It is an incredible oversight for the Government, having succeeded in encouraging other member countries to give up capital controls, not, at the same time, to take the consequences, go into the exchange rate mechanism and take up leadership there and in the inevitable discussions about monetary policy. Moves forward are not just driven by the Commission, as if we have to fear members of the Commission as ogres. Some of us talk to businesses around the country. When they start to appreciate the benefits of the European Community, they say, "Why is it that, with those benefits, we do not take the consequences further, join the exchange rate mechanism and take the lead rather than having those questions decided by the Germans and the French?"

If we do so, we can ensure that the Community develops on a basis of deregulation rather than on one of more and more regulation. I fear that we shall have to address that matter carefully in the next few months, during the Greek presidency, when we will hear old favourites under the new heading of social dimensions, which should be resisted.

Finally—it is appropriate that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary is in his place—if we take the initiative in the economic area of the European Community, we can also continue and strengthen our role as the leader in foreign policy. This is a particularly vital period when we are beginning to open up towards the Eastern bloc and when there are many signs that that will perhaps be the key area of policy development in the next few years.

It is not a question of giving up sovereignty; it is a question of redefining it. It is a question whether we are to be a mere outpost of a Community of 320 million people or take the leadership of that Community and ensure that the sort of policies that we as a Government would endorse will be accepted by our 11 partners.

9.8 pm

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Whenever I see the Government twisting and contorting over the insatiable alien that is the EEC budget, I cannot help wanting to say, "I told you so." It could not happen to a more deserving Government. The tragedy is, of course, that the Governent and the people whom they represent are not paying the full price. The full price is being paid by the skilled workers languishing on the dole. We have lost over 1 million jobs in manufacturing since we joined this expensive club. The low-paid workers in my constituency are paying a high price for food.

I do not want to waste too much time talking about the ills of joining the Common Market because I am aware that time is short and that, whatever speeches may be made by Conservative Members, the rebellion will fizzle out when we go into the Lobbies. I want to concentrate on who will get what from the new structure and, to that end, I shall address my remarks mainly to the proposal to enlarge the structural funds.

Those funds are important to areas of unemployment, particularly those areas of high unemployment and deprivation, because they are still contributing to that increase in tax. My constituency lost assisted area status in 1981. Because we do not have assisted area status, certain EEC grants are not available. Halifax is in a textile closure area. Until the end of March, local firms can benefit to some extent from the regional fund, but the local authorities do not present such a cosy picture. What is the good of grants being available from Europe when, because of their spiteful attitude to local government, the Government have prevented councils from taking advantage of such grants? The councils have also lost out heavily on regional grants because of Government policy towards local government.

In Haifax, there is to be a major factory closure, KP Foods. Conservative Members who talk about the benefits of 1992 should listen carefully. When the KP Foods factory closes in 12 months' time, it will cost nearly 1,000 jobs. In answer to a question from a colleague about the internal market in 1992, one of the directors of KP Foods said:

You are right to wonder if this had been considered in our appraisal of the future biscuit-making capacity and efficiency because it certainly has. There is no doubt that there will be increasing competition from many sources in the EEC for a share in the United Kingdom Market. This is happening now and imports from the continent are already rising".

That is clear confirmation.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that that internal market will lose us jobs in 1992? My hon. Friend will be interested to learn that I sent a copy of that letter to Lord Young, and asked him to use it in his advertising campaign—on which he is spending £3·5 million—extolling all the alleged virtues of the internal market in 1992, to explain to people that the internal market will lose jobs in Bradford, South and in Halifax.

Mrs. Mahon: My hon. Friend is absolutely right and I welcome his intervention. Halifax has also been subjected to the Nestlé takeover of Rowntree. I attended both meetings in the House and questioned the directors of both companies in detail about the effects of the takeover. I have also received replies to letters which have confirmed that part of the reason for the takeover and the subsequent rationalisation is 1992. It will be quite devastating for towns that have already lost out because of Europe.

Under the European regional development grant, Halifax has been caught in a Catch 22 situation. We do not have assisted area status, but in March, we shall also lose out under the European social fund. The KP Foods factory would have gained grant under the European social fund, but will now lose assisted area status in Europe also.

It is particularly hard for the employees of that factory in Halifax because it employs mainly women and we shall now lose retraining grants which would have been available for those women, because of the changes in grant allocation. The work force is 70 per cent. women, and 80 per cent. are part-time. Approximately 550 women will lose their jobs but will not appear on the unemployment figures because of the way in which the Government calculate figures. The Government are presenting unemployment statistics that will be detrimental to our own people, because they will lose grant. That is disgraceful. The Government are denying our own people the right to funds which are, after all, all that we are getting back for a very huge payment.

I have listened to most of the debate and what I have heard does not convince me that things will get any better. I believe that things will get much worse. There is a crisis in the regions and what I will call "invisible" unemployment. The "disappeared" exist. They know that they exist and hon. Members who represent towns like Halifax know that they exist. I challenge whoever replies to this debate to come to my constituency and see the real problems caused by our being in Europe. In particular, he should come and see the "invisible" women at KP Foods who will not show up in the Government's statistics. I assure hon. Members that those women exist.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I welcome the Bill primarily because it is an opportunity for us, within the procedures of the House, to control legislation. Unlike so much other legislation which passes through the Select Committee on European Legislation, of which I am a member, this Bill gives us an opportunity to comment upon and consider the implications. That point has been made when we consider the wide variety of views that have been expressed on the Bill's merits today.

When we talk about the percentage of money involved in relation to the overall United Kingdom budget, we see that, although the Bill would increase the resources available to the Community by 25 per cent., in terms of the overall volume of money passing through our economy, that is still a relatively small sum. I am far less concerned about that than I am about the other aspects of the Community and what I refer to as "creeping federalism", expressed best in the views of Mr. Jacques Delors, the President of the European Commission, only some 10 days ago.

I wrote an article in The Times shortly before that in which I warned about creeping federalism. It is naive and absurd for us to ignore the fact that there are people in the European Community and elsewhere who would like to see a federal Europe.

The other day I was on a television programme with a Conservative Member of the European Parliament. Quite expressly, he said that he was a federalist and that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had got it all wrong. He said that the Conservative party would have to come round to his point of view.

Recently we dealt with the liberalisation of telecommunications. Despite our Government's protests and those of most member states, the European Commission is determined to ignore those protests and introduce that measure on the basis of what it wants rather than to consider the views of the Council of Ministers, the European Parliament, the Economic and Social Committee—ECOSOC—and the national Parliaments. We should take very seriously what Mr. Delors is saying.

There are other signs of creeping federalism. I am in favour of a European Community which can provide opportunities that are exemplified by the Single European Act. It is possible to ensure that we gain the benefits and create a mutual and reciprocal Europe and at the same time retain greater effective control over what is happening in the House.

We had a debate on the glorious revolution the other day. We would not want to throw away the advantages that we have accumulated over the past three centuries in return for inverted control over our affairs. We must accept the opportunity to maintain the rights of the people who elected us and speak for them in this House on matters that increasingly affect them.

Mr. Delors is right: about 80 per cent. of the industrial, commercial and social legislation affecting the electorate is increasingly being moved into the European domain. It is up to us—as I tried to point out in my article in The Times —to ensure that we are truly involved. It is through that involvement and representation that we shall be able to demonstrate our commitment to the greater purpose and to represent the electorate more effectively.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I am pleased to have the opportunity to make one or two remarks that follow from the Foreign Secretary's introduction to the debate. He said that one purpose of the change in the budget system was in the increase in the structural fund required in the context of 1992. I hope that I have quoted him correctly. He implied that the gap in the standard of living between the south and east and the north and west of this country is likely to remain a serious problem for public policy. I assume that he did not mean the alternative interpretation, which is that the regional differences within the Community, between the Mediterranean regions, which have never been industrialised, and the industrial regions, will remain wide.

If the Government had represented the whole country, rather than being dominated by the south and the east, they would have effected a different compromise between their desire to see discipline brought into agricultural expenditure and the need to explain the structural funds to solve the north-south, east-west gap in this country, as well as the problems of the Mediterranean regions.

This is a compromise; it is not a victory. The Government love referring to victories, and Back Benchers have been falling into that trap tonight. Every time Ministers return from a Council of Ministers meeting, they are like slightly cultured football hooligans, always talking about victory, success, and leadership, but never about compromise, which is what they have just made. Obviously, the legislation is a compromise, and it is a Tory compromise. It does not take sufficient account of the needs of the regions.

However, the Foreign Secretary said that, in the context of 1992, the north and west of this country—Wales, Scotland and the northern region, not just Northern Ireland, which he emphasised—will have serious problems. Therefore, we need a greater emphasis on the regional and structural funds. We need them to be oriented to solving the problems in the industrial regions and to addressing the question of how those regions will catch up with the south and east, which have all the geographical advantages of being next to the Channel tunnel and the centre of the Community as an economic market.

I hope that the Paymaster General will give us an explanation of what he will do to bend the Community and its policies towards a solution of the problems of Wales and the other disadvantaged regions of the Community.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): We have had a wide-ranging debate, which is appropriate because the Bill is concerned with the Community budget until the early 1990s and the allegedly magic date of 1992. We have covered major issues, including sovereignty and whether the Community brings about a loss of sovereignty rather than its extension. We have discussed internationalism, federalism, confederalism and regional interests, and it is clear that there is division on many of those issues. Government and Opposition Members have different views on those matters and that is understandable.

The Community itself is not an unchanging institution and has changed dramatically over the years. When the Coal and Steel Community was founded in the early 1950s, it was described by Maurice Schumann, the then French Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in glowing terms. He said that the Coal and Steel Community would mean that war between France and Germany would be not only morally unthinkable, but materially impossible. Sadly, that forward-looking initiative was nonetheless retrospective. The main issue facing Europe was not a possible war between France and Germany, but future relations between east and west Europe, to which some hon. Members, notably the hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) referred. They asked how the Community should now respond to the recent overtures of Comecon, the Eastern European countries and the Soviet Union.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) made a telling point. When we talk about sovereignty and effective parliamentary democracy, just how effect is the democracy in this Chamber on this Bill? I am advised by those with experience of this matter that it is virtually impossible to amend the Bill. In one sense this reflects the Government's majority, in that, despite the dissenting voices of some Conservative Members, they can use it to get the Bill through. But in any effective democracy it should be possible to amend a Bill both in Committee and on the Floor of the House. It should be possible to use the scalpel rather than the steamroller. Otherwise, we are applying double standards in saying that the European Assembly is an ineffective talking shop which cannot restrain the increase in agricultural spending when it is not clear whether we can do so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) also made some telling points, such as we have become accustomed to from him. He spoke about the considerable significance of the Bill, especially as it reflects the Single European Act which, in terms of public perception, has quietly transformed the long-standing Gaullist veto agreed at the Luxembourg compromise in January 1966 into the reintroduction of majority voting. It is argued that increased payments will be made which have not yet been approved by our Parliament and which may have been opposed by British Ministers in the Council of Ministers. We shall have a 25 per cent. increase in real terms in EC expenditure.

Hon. Friends, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), have already pointed out that commitments at Fontainebleau have not been realised and we have not managed to restrain spending on the common agricultural policy. One of the most effective ways of reducing spending under the CAP would be to do something not yet mentioned in the debate, which is to achieve a reduction in prices inside the Community. That should include threshold prices, and commodities which are produced by other countries, particularly the least developed countries, which can achieve no comparative advantage in the modern and advanced technology industries open to the Community. They are highly, if not completely, dependent on such access for an increase in their income and standard of living. The European Community has not addressed that sufficiently, just as its aid disbursement has been notoriously slow and ineffective.

The Community has further problems with the regional fund. It may be said that the structural funds, including the regional fund, will increase by x, y or z per cent., and some of those percentages look dramatic. But we should bear in mind how ineffective the Community regional fund has been to date. In recent years it has varied between one twentieth and less than one fifteenth of the total EC budget. Since total EEC spending itself for most of that period has been less than 1 per cent. of GDP, this amounts to a very minor fraction of the Community's GDP as a whole. Granted that only one tenth of the regional budget changes hands between member countries, one then has about one two hundredth of 1 per cent. of the Community's GDP changing hands, so one is talking about one which comes within the accounting errors of virtually any well-managed international agency.

So I am not terrified, and I think that other Opposition Members are certainly not terrified, by an increase in the spending under the regional fund. What we want to see is effective spending under that regional fund and we should get some social indicators for that spending. The issue of juste retour should be addressed in a new sense. Jacques Delors has argued for a social market and social criteria inside the Community and if we are talking about that we should make certain that there is a net shift of resources towards the less privileged people in the lesser and least developed regions of the Community. However, it does not make any sense to have such a spending programme if, as has traditionally been the case in the Community, it is only to be on infrastructure rather than on enterprise.

It is absolutely classic to say, when in doubt, build a road. When doubly in doubt, build oneself a free enterprise zone, which is an elaborate form of the advance factory building programme that we have in the United Kingdom. We have learnt through our experience in this country and as introduced by the Labour Government in the 1970s, that one needs a much more public entrepreneurial approach. That is what we argued for in the case of the Scottish and Welsh Development Agencies. The Government have not scrapped those agencies—they have not dared to do so.

Yet when the Community comes forward with a reasonable proposal for local and regional government sponsorship of entrepreneurial ventures to strengthen the regional fabric of the Community, as we learnt in the most recent debate touching on those issues in May, the Government will not support that. If I may say it to the hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon, that is one difference between our position and that of the Government.

The other aspects of such difference are certainly easy to elaborate. I can illustrate them by what the Foreign Secretary said in the opening debate. I was entertained when he said that the Government would seek finance on a sound basis, that some progress had been made at Hanover, and that we would find the best way of doing this. He then claimed that the agenda had been set by the British.

I say to him and again to the hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon that that agenda was not in fact set by the British. It was set by Andreas Papandreou at the December 1984 summit in Athens and echoed by Francois Mitterrand in June 1985. It was there, when the Community was stuck in the mud of the common agricultural policy and could not set a serious agenda on any major issue affecting either the recovery of the European economy, the restructuring of European industry or our relations with the Third world, that it was put by a Socialist Prime Minister and a Socialist President that we needed fundamentally to rethink the institutions of the Community. They proposed a new Messina conference. That conference has the same relation to the Rome treaty as, for example, Bretton Woods has to international monetary affairs. It was from their arguments and their pressure that much of the recent change that we have seen has been realised.

Jacques Delors has been mentioned more than once during the debate. The hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon argues that the proposals coming from the Government or the Community are not accepted by us and asks how our position is different. It is very different, as is Jacques Delors' position. He has argued that the liberalised internal market must be complemented by a social market, that there must be a raising of practices at work to the best standards available in the Community, that we have to achieve an opening of the books, with accountability and industrial democracy in leading enterprises in the Community, and that we have to take measures to promote small and medium firms and enable them to network and gain the advantages from mutual size through joint ventures in Community. For many years Jacques Delors has notably argued that we need a recovery programme in the European Community.

Our Government are identified with none of those proposals. Yet such proposals could make 1992 of real interest to working people throughout Europe. At the moment all we have is the proposal for the harmonisation of passport covers, but not the abolition of tariff barriers. A harmonisation mania has taken over without the willingness for joint international action to co-operate on some of the urgent issues that face Europe, especially joint action for jobs and joint accountability of the new multinational companies that are dominating the Community.

When I first raised the matter of multinationals with the Government I stressed the major increase in the market share held by the top 100 companies in the Community from the early 1960s to the 1980s. They have doubled their share of the market. That increase is coming home to the public, through the press, because of bids made by multinational companies for British companies. I would not say that all of my hon. Friends are against such bids, but they want a means of accountability for such bids and a public policy framework that countervails the power of multinational capital in Europe. My hon. Friends want work practices safeguarded and workers rights extended. Within that framework our position differs from the Government about what 1992 is or should be about.

We believe that the GDP base is a better foundation for budget assessment. It is interesting to see from the proposals before us that there will be a working party of the Commission, which will constantly evaluate what GDP is about. I was quite amused when one hon. Member said, almost spitting the words, "the Italians". By implication he was talking about the Italian black market and meant that the Italians' GDP would be understated and therefore their contribution would be less than it should be.

As it happens, one reason for the increase in the growth registered in the Italian economy is precisely because the Italians have made estimates of their black economy and their shadow economy and included them within their assessment. By and large such things can be sorted out provided that we can break into the private language game between the professional economists and get some sense into the argument.

If we are to have a new committee for accounting within the Community, we should implement articles 85 and 86 of the treaty of Rome. We should gain transparency on the activities of the octoploid multinational enterprises, which are presently not accountable to any Community procedure—they are accountable to virtually nobody but themselves. If we were to do that we would discover a lot more public interest in what is happening in the Community.

The position that we argue is not federalist, it is internationalist. We argue for joint international action within the Community, but, in contrast with some hon. Members on both sides of the House, I would not argue that this denies one's sovereignty. Effective joint international action can extend one's sovereignty and it is a collective expression of it. The contrast therefore is not between nationalism and supranationalism. The case must be made for changing the political agenda of the Community and for putting on its agenda and of our Parliament the issues that concern not only our people, but the peoples of Italy, Spain, West Germany and elsewhere. The tragedy is that our Government will simply not join or extend that debate.

The Prime Minister has dismayed her counterparts abroad—and I am not just talking about Socialist Prime Ministers or Heads of State. When the Prime Minister kept on about the rebate and only the rebate, Mr. Chirac made a remark that was something like "I've had enough of this cracking of nuts." It is quite clear that the Prime Minister could not co-operate with the then Prime Minister of France. She cannot even co-operate with the present Chancellor of West Germany.

In coming to a conclusion in supporting the reasoned amendment that the Opposition have put forward, I draw attention to a report by Patricia Clough in The Independent on 8 July. I have never met Patricia Clough and I do not know her views on Community matters, but she wrote:

> "Highly influential German politicians, who wish Britain well, are intensely irritated by the way Mrs. Thatcher has been built up in Britain as the senior and most prestigious European statesperson who can speak for Europe on a world platform. They are staggered that this can be claimed of a person who has been, and is still, obstructing progress to European unity. 'She does not speak for Europeans. She does not think like a European and she does not even try to understand them' said one. 'She only speaks for Britain's narrow provincial interests.'"

That is the bottom line of the weakness and limitation of the Government's position. It is one reason why we have argued for an extension of the structural funds—for spending on the social fund, the environment, regional development and the developing countries. It is one of the reasons why I am sure that my right hon. and hon. Friends will join me in supporting the reasoned amendment in the Lobby this evening.

9.40 pm

The Paymaster General (Mr. Peter Brooke): This has been a colourful debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) talked about Louis XIV and the Last Chance saloon. My hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) played a role as the parliamentary golf champion. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), not disagreeably, but irrelevantly, introduced Mr. Charles Powell into the debate.

The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), in opening the debate on behalf of the Opposition, spent an enormous amount of time on the presence of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, a presence which all of my right hon. and hon. Friends welcomed. I can assume only that the time that the hon. Gentleman devoted to that was designed to conceal the absence from the Opposition Front Bench of the Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith).

I shall comment on several of the subjects that have been raised and I shall take them in the order in which they were raised. The structural funds were spoken of initially by the hon. Member for Hamilton, the hon. Members for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin), for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid), for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths), for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) and for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan), and by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen).

I would never describe my hon. Friend as a member of a small and disgusting minority, as he did. I thought that he was a little less than generous in his remarks about the Whips' Office and the documentation that is available there. I sensed that he might not be supporting the Government. I am sorry that he is not subject to the same military discipline as that which he described when referring to my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham at an earlier stage.

The hon. Member for Gateshead, East raised a number of subjects when talking about the structural funds and I shall respond to the general topics. In that process, I hope that I shall deal with the contributions of other hon. Members. The United Kingdom can be expected to benefit from all of the five priority objectives which were agreed at Brussels and enshrined in the framework regulations.

As the hon. Member for Gateshead, East said, Northern Ireland has been included in the agreed list of less-developed regions, in recognition of its special political and economic difficulties, although it does not meet the standards or criteria for inclusion under the objective. Most of the United Kingdom assisted areas should continue to be eligible for support under the second objective, which is to help with the problems of industrial decline. That includes the major areas of decline. Help for the peripheral areas, such as the Highlands and Islands, rural Wales, and many parts of south-west England, will be available under the fifth objective. The third objective is to combat long-term unemployment and the fourth is to improve training, especially for young people.

The social fund will continue to be focused on activities that are priorities for the United Kingdom, such as youth training and assistance for the long-term unemployed. In 1988, social fund commitments for the United Kingdom totalled over £400 million, and the funds as a whole total £750 million.

As I have said, the fifth objective is to promote rural development. It is important that a link has been made between the operation of the funds and the reform of the CAP. There will also be commercial opportunities for British companies and employers in other parts of the Community in terms of the application of funds there.

The hon. Member for Halifax invited me to her constituency. I may have to go in my capacity as chairman of the Conservative party rather than as Paymaster General, but I gladly accept her invitation. The hon. Member for Gateshead, East and other hon. Members referred to research. I stress that it is necessary to ensure that we get value for money in research and development expenditure and that we do not fund bad research.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) was the first to mention GNP statistics, and he was followed by the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) and my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South. It is precisely because our statistics and those of others are not good enough that the European Council decided in February that a directive was needed on the harmonisation of GNP statistics.

The directive's aim, which has been agreed by the Council, is to guarantee the comparability and uniformity of national GNP statistics and to provide for them to be verified and revised as necessary. The directive explicitly provides for the scrutiny of member states' GNP estimates by a management committee containing national experts of all member states. In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South, I should say that hon. Members must be aware that many of the weaknesses that apply to GNP statistics apply to VAT statistics, too.

The hon. Member for Hamilton mentioned the IGA and implied that it is on top of the increase in own resources provided for in the Bill. Total payments to the budget for 1988, including the IGA and own resources payments, will be within the new ceiling of 1·15 per cent. of GNP. He seemed to forget that the IGA is a gross contribution that will give rise both to extra receipts by the United Kingdom and to extra abatement next year. Expressing the IGA contribution as a percentage of our net contribution is not comparing like with like.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing joined the hon. Member for Hamilton, and was joined by my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor), on the subject of legal enforceability. The Council can limit the exercise of its powers over obligatory expenditure, on which it has the last word, but it cannot limit the powers of the European Parliament over non-obligatory expenditure, on which the Parliament has the last word. We could not have obtained the agreement of other member states to amend the treaty to limit significantly the budgetary powers of the Parliament—nor was such a treaty amendment necessary. But by imposing own resources sub-ceilings, we can limit the amount of resources available for total spending. Given the limits on agricultural spending, that limits the resources for non-obligatory expenditure, too.

The hon. Members for Hamilton and for Newham, South mentioned the effect on our gross contribution of the increase in the own resources ceiling. On the basis of the 1988 figures, the increase in the own resources ceiling 1·2 per cent. of GNP will increase our gross contribution, before abatement, by up to a maximum of a little under £1 billion. However, that will be greatly offset by additional receipts and some extra abatement.

The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) may have misunderstood the effect of moving from 1 per cent. VAT to 1·4 per cent., and described it as a 40 per cent. increase in own resources. Other aspects of own resources need to be taken into account, so the overall effect was less—some 15 or 20 per cent.

My hon. Friend the Member for Horsham mentioned the public expenditure White Paper projection of net payments to the Community institutions in 1988-89. That projection was £800 million, not £1,470 million. The £1,470 million related to 1989-90. The Brussels package will increase our net payments by £200 million to £300 million a year, but I fear that my hon. Friend will have to wait until the Autumn Statement for a more detailed projection, giving revised figures year by year.

The hon. Member for Bridgend referred to the fourth resource. On the basis of the 1988 figures, GNP contributions could amount to up to 25 per cent. of the budget, if expenditure were at the 1·2 per cent. of GNP ceiling. The Government could not accept amendment of the Bill to exclude GNP contributions from own resources: that would be tantamount to rejecting the new own resources decision. The Government support the introduction of GNP contributions, as they bring own resources more into line with relative prosperity.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) apologised to me for having to leave the debate early to go north. He referred first to what had been said by Mr. Delors. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), who also apologised for having to leave early, the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney and my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South also referred to Mr. Delors.

I am aware of the statement by the President of the Commission to the European Parliament in Strasbourg on 6 July. It reflected Mr. Delors' personal view. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), who has been here for only part of the debate, will excuse me, I have read the speech in French. Mr. Delors explained that he was speaking personally. It is important to remember the audience that he was addressing.

Mr. Delors' views do not reflect those of Her Majesty's Government. We do not believe that in 10 years' time 80 per cent. of economic, social and fiscal legislation will originate in the Community. Mr. Delors' statement was more indicative of the audience that he was addressing than of the true facts. I suspect that his intervention was intended to stress the need for national Parliaments not to accept uncritically what is happening in Brussels. He did not include this House in his remarks.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing referred to the monitoring of agricultural expenditure and sought an assurance that agricultural expenditure would be properly monitored. I am happy to give him that assurance. Under article 6 of the budget discipline decision, the Commission will submit monthly reports on the development of agricultural expenditure, sector by sector, both to the Council of Ministers and to the European Parliament.

Mr. Higgins: Many hon. Members are puzzled by what my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary said, and my right hon. Friend has just repeated that obligatory expenditure will be subject to binding legal restraints, or budgetary discipline, but that that will not apply to non-obligatory expenditure. My right hon. and learned Friend also said that none the less there is an overall legally binding budgetary discipline and that therefore we need not worry about the fact that it does not apply to non-obligatory expenditure. We are puzzled by that. Perhaps my right hon. Friend will spell it out. If it means merely the GNP ceiling, that is not an effective measure.

Mr. Brooke: The inter-institutional agreement that was approved by the Ecofin Council on 13 June, and by the European Parliament on 15 June, is a political agreement on the procedural and financial framework for implementing the conclusions of the Brussels European Council on budgetary discipline and the level of expenditure. The reference framework for the agreement is the financial perspective for 1988 to 1992, drawn up in accordance with the Brussels conclusions. The perspective will be subject to technical adjustments—for example, to update it to current prices. Other revisions to individual elements can be made only by agreement between Council and Parliament and then only within the overall expenditure ceiling, plus a safety margin for unforeseen expenditure of 0·03 per cent. of GNP. The payment ceilings in the inter-institutional agreement, together with the safety margin, constitute the annual own resources sub-ceilings, set out in the own resources decision. The ORD also includes for the first time a ceiling on commitments.

It would not be possible to have such a legally binding instrument on budgetary discipline for non-obligatory expenditure, because it would fetter the powers of the Parliament that I have described. The inter-institutional agreement is a political agreement between the institutions, and the sub-ceilings in the ORD are a legally binding constraint on both revenue and overall expenditure. Given the legally binding limit on agricultural and on other obligatory spending, the sub-ceilings necessarily limit the amount available for non-obligatory expenditure.

My hon. Friends the Members for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer), for Horsham, for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry), for Esher (Mr. Taylor) and for Stafford (Mr. Cash) all made speeches that varied between the eloquent and the pithy in supporting the Community.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow asked me six questions, the first five of which were rather more relevant and serious than the last. Nevertheless, he indicated by the tone of his questions his basic support for the Community. As for his question about the American drought, it is too early to assess its precise impact on the Community budget. If the recent increase in world prices for many commodities is sustained, expenditure on Community subsidies should fall. I do not accept that occasional adverse weather justifies a policy of maintaining large food stocks in the Community. I have seen a recent report that the United States has in store six months' supply of food, and there is therefore no reason to expect any serious disruption in food supplies.

Dr. Reid: Can the Minister explain to the House what he meant by the Government continuing to monitor agricultural expenditure? Once, there was a Scottish goalkeeper named Frank Haffey who, in retrospect, could be said to have monitored the ball going into the net behind him at Wembley. Is that the kind of monitoring that the Minister has in mind?

Mr. Brooke: I congratulate the hon. Member for Motherwell, North on his analogy. The monitoring takes the form of reporting by the Commission to the Council. As the hon. Gentleman knows, that reporting process places an obligation on the Commission and on the Council to respond to the situation in which they find themselves.

The hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) referred to the amendment which the hon. Member for Hamilton moved on behalf of the Opposition. Going back into history, there was a speech made by the now noble Lord Callaghan, in the heartlands of the Labour party, in Islington, on 26 April 1975, when he said:

"In the matter of the Budget, we made a flat request that Britain's share should be reduced in certain circumstances . . . Long and arduous negotiations produced a satisfactory result. Britain will now pay less."

The effect of those renegotiations in 1974-75 was that they did not save us a single ecu.

By comparison, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said at Luxembourg on 18 October 1979:

"Britain cannot accept the present situation. It is demonstrably unjust. It is politically indefensible . . . the balance is not compatible with the spirit of the Community. Its continuation would undermine the sense of solidarity and common obligation which lies at the base of Community endeavour."

As a consequence of the Government's actions, we achieved negotiated refunds of more than £2·5 billion between 1980 and 1984, and the Fontainebleau abatement has been worth £3 billion since then.

The hon. Member for Newham, South quoted Latin. I have long been conscious that the Latin word for left is "sinister". I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South, who placed Mr. Delors in the Last Chance saloon, that Conservative Members will recall that Mr. Delors is a Socialist.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Question accordingly agreed to.
Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When I came out of the No Lobby, two Tory Whips, led by the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South-East (Mr. Lightbown) whose rather menacing bulk can now been seen at the Bar of the House, were taking down the names of those Tory Members who voted No. That could be regarded as besetting and intimidation and, as you know, Mr. Speaker, by law that cannot be carried out by trade unionists. If the law is good enough for trade unionists, it should be good enough for Tory Members and should stop them intimidating their hon. Friends. If there is any intimidation, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to carry out an investigation to see if there is a serious breach of privilege by those Tory thugs.

Mr. Speaker: I have no knowledge of any intimidation. The Whips might have been inviting those hon. Members to dinner.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House. —[Mr. Ryder.]

Committee tomorrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered;

That, at this day's sitting, the Court of Session Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.— [Mr. Ryder.]

European Communities (Finance) Bill
[Money]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the European Communities (Finance) Bill, it is expedient to authorise—

(1) any increase attributable to that Act in the sums to be charged on and paid out of the Consolidated Fund or the National Loans Fund, or payable out of money provided by Parliament, under the European Communities Act 1972; and

(2) the payment of any sums into the Consolidated Fund or the National Loans Fund.—[Mr. Brooke.]

10.33 pm

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): The money resolution, which represents an increase in expenditure of at least £200 million to £300 million net and, according to the Minister earlier, as much as £1 billion gross, should not be allowed to pass unchallenged. That is against the background of some £4·7 billion in net expenditure to the Common Market. After all the grants, repayments and gains from rebates which the Prime Minister alleges, since 1984 we have paid out more than £4 billion, and we shall continue to do so. That money could be used for the excellent purpose of helping to rejuvenate and regenerate the National Health Service or in providing long-term jobs and stopping the continuing erosion of jobs to which the Common Market has led.

Membership of the EEC has been a millstone around our necks. We have a deficit in our balance of trade of manufactured goods of some £11 billion. The Minister said that some of the payments in this money resolution —between £200 million and £300 million—would go to the structural funds in order to offset the adverse impact of the development of the internal market by 1992. It is patently absurd for our Government to hand to another organisation money which it then scrutinises and from which it takes a hefty percentage for administration, only to hand some, but not all, back to us for some sort of remedial action in the regions. It is no longer in the province of the elected Government.

While I disagree with virtually everything that the Government do, they are elected and are to some degree accountable. Certainly, they will be accountable at the general election, which is not true of the Commissioners. It is largely the Commission and its machinery which decides where the money will be spent. The Council of Ministers, which meets in secret so is not publicly accountable as we are in this House, lays down only general spending guidelines. The Commission and various directorates-general decide where the money will go.

It is absurd for us to hand over an additional £200 million to £300 million only for many local authorities to spend large sums going in good faith to Brussels to plead their case cap in hand because, continually pressed by the Government through rate support grant cuts and so on, they are short of money. It is wrong, inefficient and undemocratic to hand money over to another body only to receive a relatively small proportion of it back.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): I am more than uncommonly grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Is it not time that he straightened out his argument? Is it not a fact that most Socialist member states and Members of Parliament and the British Labour group argue for an increase in the structural funds which the hon. Gentleman is attacking? Why is he out of line?

Mr. Cryer: The hon. Gentleman, as usual, is badly misinformed. The vast majority of the Socialist group in the Common Market happen to be pro-Market fanatics. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh".] They are chosen on a list system based on proportional representation which a majority in this House would reject and which gives great power to the party ladership. In most Socialist parties in the EEC, if anybody steps out of line, he is immediately knocked off the list for that political dissent. I do not take too much notice of the hon. Gentleman's views.

The fact is that those of us in the British Labour group are critical of the maldistribution of Common Market funds—70 per cent. or therabouts goes to the common agricultural policy. Ever since we joined in 1973 members have been claiming that reform is round the corner or will come next year, but it never comes. The proportion of expenditure that goes on the CAP has been increasing, with one or two ebbs and flows, virtually since we entered the Common Market. I shall come to a report from the Select Committee which very much substantiates my claim.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): My hon. Friend said that in the Common Market countries other than Britain have a list system in which Members of Parliament are picked off according to how they fit in with their party. My hon. Friend raised a point of order about the Tory Chief Whip standing outside the Division Lobby ticking off the names of those Tory Members of Parliament who had voted with us against the Bill. One is bound to get the impression that Tory Members of Parliament are getting ready to operate their own list system.

Mr. Cryer: It sounds very much like that, as my hon. Friend says. I am worried about what shreds of democracy are left in the Tory party, judging by the way in which two brutal-looking thugs stood outside the No Lobby looking menacingly towards those who had voted with the Labour party.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Gentleman has just been talking about thugs. There is an article in today's edition of The Independent about Sergeant Bob Cryer. Will you clarify, Mr. Deputy Speaker, whether the hon. Gentleman is the Sergeant Bob Cryer referred to in The Independent? He is talking about thugs——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. What appears in a newspaper is not a matter for me.

Mr. Cryer: I am most grateful. I am best able to decide which Bob Cryer is represented in The Independent or any other newspaper.

I should like to finish my comments about what the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) said. There is——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the House that it is contrary to our practice to read newspapers during debate.

Mr. Cryer: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker for scrupulously carrying out the Standing Orders of the House and preventing Tory Members who who do not seem to know much about it from driving a coach and horses through them.

Let me get back to the hon. Member for Darlington. There is a pro-Market uncritical majority of all the parties in the Assembly, so anybody in the House who claims that the Assembly, called by some a Parliament—but it is in fact a consultative Assembly, that and no more—will act as some sort of check, is living in cloud-cuckoo-land.

Mr. Fallon: I am grateful, and I undertake to the hon. Gentleman, who has been most courteous, not to intervene again if he will answer this specific question. He referred to the proportion of agriculture expenditure increasing. I should have drawn his attention to the fact that throughout that time not only was there a Socialist majority in the European Assembly that he despises, but he was a member of it. I shall not labour that point, but I ask him this specific question. Does he now still perceive that Socialist majority, including the British Labour group, to be uncritical, and if so, will he vote for it in next year's elections?

Mr. Cryer: The Socialist majority that the hon. Gentleman talks about is an illusion. There is not a Socialist majority in the Common Market Assembly. The Socialist group represents about 150 out of 450 and on anybody's calculation that is a minority. When one couples up all the European democrats, the Le Pen Fascist group and the rest of the Right wing, they have a majority. When one couples up those who are Euro-fanatics and totally uncritical, there is an even bigger majority.

As I mentioned, the Assembly does not represent a critical body. There are strong strains and pressures for federalism, and for even more power to be taken away from bodies such as this and put across to the Assemblies in Brussels and Strasbourg. Jacques Delors does not represent an isolated strain, talking to a particular audience. His view is representative of the majority of the Commission and almost certainly the majority of the Assembly.

The Single European Act started out as a campaign by Alteiro Spinelli, a member of the Communist list in Italy, and his campaign was supported by the European Democrats, the Christian Democrats and the Liberal Democrats, but not, at any stage, by the British Labour group. That campaign by Spinelli was to wrest power from the member states and transfer it to the EEC assembly.

Sir Jim Spicer (Dorset, West) rose——

Mr. Cryer: We are discussing the money resolution, and I shall resist the temptation to give way.

Sir Jim Spicer rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is clear that the hon. Gentleman does not intend to give way.

Mr. Cryer: I just wish that some of the Tory hooligans were better behaved. They set a poor example when they stand up against your express wishes, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as well as mine.

Sir Jim Spicer: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cryer: No.

The fifth report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee was referred to in the debate. It is a Committee with a Conservative majority, and on page 7 of its report, it states:

"We are not convinced that an inter-institutional agreement is the equivalent of a firm and legally binding text. Given the Community's failure in the past to control its expenditure and notwithstanding the many significant improvements which were agreed at the Brussels summit, we believe there are still grounds for remaining sceptical about the prospects for proper budgetary control in the future. We believe the Government should press the Community to adopt the most rigorous forms of budget management."

Although the Government may press the case, our experience from 1973 onwards is that there is little or no budgetary control. The Select Committe, which has a Conservative majority, sets that out lucidly. Therefore I believe that we must have strong reservations about a money resolution that hands over between another £200 million and £400 million to a body that experience and its proven record has shown to be incapable of budgetary control.

We may suppose that some of that money will come back, but to hand money to another body, which has proved itself to be inefficient, in the hope that we will get a tiny share of it back, is an extremely inefficient way in which to deal with the matter. The money resolution, in common with the Bill, is much misplaced.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) has an honourable record in opposing the expansion of European expenditure.

When I came in to listen to the hon. Gentleman I thought that he might say something that I could support. I then discovered that he was objecting to an increase in European expenditure on the grounds that the European Parliament—or "the Assembly" as he has described and criticised it—would be assenting to that expenditure. Back in 1984, he offered himself to the European electorate as a member of that European Assembly and for five long years he sat as a member of it. Had the same argument come from the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), we would have treated it with slightly more respect. Instead, it came from an hon. Member who took European money, air tickets, jobs, junkets and expenses. He now has the nerve to lecture us on increases in European expenditure.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South) rose——

Mr. Fallon: I am so shocked that I can only give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall).

Mr. Marshall: Is my hon. Friend aware that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) voted in favour of taking note of the sixth VAT directive, which he has been so busy criticising in recent weeks?

Mr. Fallon: That directive is outside the scope of the resolution that is before us.

We must not disregard the fact that the hon. Member for Bradford, South was a part of the European Assembly, and voted time and time again for increases in the European budget and increases in the structural funds—the philosophy and the theory of social space, which we now hear so much about on behalf of the poorer member states. The hon. Gentleman voted for the extra moneys. Yet he has the nerve to lecture us about increases for the funds.

We know that we have a far greater chance of controlling the funds and regulation expenditure through our Ministers at the Council of Ministers than the Ministers that the hon. Member for Bradford, South would have supported. There may be other financial resolutions on which the hon. Gentleman and I will agree, but he should be the last person to lecture the House on European expenditure. I have one piece of advice for the hon. Gentleman before he tells us what view we should take of the resolution and before we come to vote in the European elections next May. If I were the hon. Gentleman, I would keep very quiet.

The Paymaster General (Mr. Peter Brooke): I owe an apology to the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) for not giving way to him in the concluding minutes of the Second Reading debate. I am delighted to have the opportunity of rendering that apology. I think that I have the general purport of what he would have said if he had intervened at that stage. I apologise also to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) for not saying that I would answer the questions which he asked subsequently to the one to which I responded. I understand that he intended his final question to be broadly rhetorical.

Mr. Dalyell: The final question on Mr. Powell is the most interesting.

Mr. Brooke: There was one question not asked of me during the Second Reading debate which would have been relevant to the resolution and to which I should like to allude. No one asked me what would happen if we were asked for intergovernmental agreement payments before the Bill has been enacted. It is likely that IGA payments will be requested from 1 August. If the Bill has not been enacted by then, the Government envisage making payments from the contingency fund, given that the House has signalled its approval of the principle of making IGA payments by giving the Bill a Second Reading.

This would be in accordance with the purpose of the contingency fund to meet urgent services in Anticipation of provision for those services by Parliament. At the same time it would take account of the key tests on the use of the fund, including, as explained by the then Financial Secretary to the Treasury in 1974, the right hon. Member for Dudley, East (Dr. Gilbert):

"No Government of either party would be reckless enough to incur expenditure on any subject by using the fund if they thought there was any possibility of Parliament's later rejecting the substantive proposals when placed before the House."—[Official Report, 14 May 1974; Vol. 873, c. 1250.] The advances from the contingency fund would be repaid through the Consolidated Fund once the Bill had received Royal Assent.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): Why should the Paymaster General be so presumptuous after the Bill has received a Second Reading? The Bill has two separate and distinct components and I should like to know why he presumes that the House will approve it in Committee and on Third Reading. Why was this not part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, or that of the Foreign Secretary, on Second Reading? The House should have been told at that stage that this strange, perverse and, I would suggest, probably unprecedented procedure would be followed in the circumstances that have been outlined by the Paymaster General.

Mr. Brooke: It is not unprecedented, because I alluded to the guidance given by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury in the Labour Administration in 1974 as to the use of the contingency fund.

As to the likelihood of the Bill being defeated, I draw to the attention of the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) the fact that the majority on Second Reading exceeded by a substantial majority the Government's natural majority in the House. Even the presence of the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) and the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) would not be enough to make up for that deficit.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The question was not asked, at least in one quarter, because the contingency would not appear to arise. The Paymaster General will know that the undertaking is not given to the Commission or to the Council, but is an undertaking of member states outside the treaty. He has just told us that there may be a request for the money to be paid, but who can legally make such a request? The undertaking is outside the terms of the treaty of Rome and formally nothing to do with the EEC.

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) knows, because of the procedures through which we have been at various stages, including evidence that I have given to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, that the procedures relating to the budget for 1988 contained an assumption that in the fulness of time there would be an IGA. That IGA has now been agreed by the member states, but I agree that it is subject to the approval of both Houses and to a request for payment. That contingency may arise on 1 August.

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the European Communities (Finance) Bill, it is expedient to authorise—

(1) any increase attributable to that Act in the sums to be charged on and paid out of the Consolidated Fund or the National Loans Fund, or payable out of money provided by Parliament, under the European Communities Act 1972; and

(2) the payment of any sums into the Consolidated Fund or the National Loans Fund.

Rate Support Grant (Scotland)

11.8 pm

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Mr. Ian Lang): I beg to move,

That the Rate Support Grant (Scotland) Order 1988, dated 11 May 1988, a copy of which was laid before this House on 19 May, be approved.

The order has three main purposes. As a result of local authorities' planned overspending this year in comparison with their guidelines, the first purpose is to reduce the amount of grant payable in respect of 1988-89 by £140 million and to determine revised grant payments accordingly.

The second purpose is to adjust the rate support grant payable to Scottish local authorities in respect of the previous financial year, 1987-88. That involves the return of substantial grant penalties totalling £89 million in respect of that year in response to lower overspending by authorities at provisional outturn stage.

Thirdly, the order implements minor adjustments in grant in respect of earlier years in the light of more up-to-date information. The effect is to decrease grant for 1986-87 by £0·1 million and to increase grant for 1985-86 by £3·2 million.

I shall deal first with the reduction in grant for 1988-89. Let me begin by setting the issue in context. Last July my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State announced, in respect of 1988-89 and for the second successive year, a rate support grant settlement based on local authorities' own budgets for the year then in operation—1987-88—uprated for inflation and certain other specific costs that were expected to arise. Provision for local authority relevant current expenditure in Scotland in 1988-89 was set at £3,640 million, or broadly 4 per cent. over authorities' total budgets for 1987-88. The grant percentage was maintained at 55·5 per cent., and aggregate Exchequer grant was fixed at £2,372 million. The provision and grant figures were respectively 9 per cent. and 8·2 per cent. above the corresponding figures for 1987-88—at a time when the projected general level of inflation was under 4 per cent. All that, and detailed proposals for grant distribution, were set out in the Rate Support Grant (Scotland) (No. 3) Order 1987, which the House approved on 18 January this year.

In his announcement last July my right hon. and learned Friend described the settlement as "realistic and fair". That is a modest understatement, and it was clear at the time that the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities thought so too. In fact, the level of provision came very close to the figure of £3,677 million that COSLA was seeking for the year—within 1 per cent.

We felt that with that settlement we had done our bit, and hoped that the local authorities would respond by careful budgeting, with low rate increases, for 1988-89. Many authorities did so: the number budgeting within guideline has increased from 28 last year to 34 this year. Further evidence of the reasonable response of many authorities is to be found in the low rate increases that large numbers of Scottish households have experienced this year. I think that it is very satisfactory that 50 per cent. of Scottish households have experienced rate increases no higher than the going rate of inflation.

On the other hand, the extent of rate increases is not in itself a fully accurate indicator of underlying trends in expenditure, as rates are only one way of financing expenditure. Another is, of course grant, but authorities also have at their disposal receipts, reserves and balances. Some authorities, even with low rate increases, have still approved budgets well over guidelines for the coming year, and authorities' planned expenditure as a whole in 1988-89 is 2·9 per cent. higher in volume terms than was their provisional outturn expenditure for 1987-88. In total, there is a planned expenditure over guideline of £136·5 million, or 3·8 per cent. It is particularly worth noting that Strathclyde and Lothian regions alone account for £116 million, or 85 per cent. of the overspend, while £130 million, or 95 per cent. of the overspend, is accounted for by only six authorities.

That is the background against which we must consider the grant penalties. They are the consequence of high budgeted overspending. Local authorities were well warned before they drew up their budgets—not least in my speech in the House on 18 January this year—that the Government would respond to overspending with grant penalties.

In considering the detail of the penalty proposals set out in the order, my right hon. and learned Friend and I have listened to and considered carefully the representations that COSLA has made to us, both in writing and through its officials, and a meeting which we had with the convention on 29 April. I acknowledge, of course, that COSLA opposes grant penalties in principle. But I would like to address myself to two more detailed comments which it made.

First, COSLA disputed the effectiveness of penalties in persuading authorities to revise their expenditure during the year. That is not the conclusion that I draw from the provisional outturn figures for last year, which give rise to the grant now being returned in respect of that year. Many authorities' provisional outturn expenditure, by the end of the financial year, will be somewhat below their budget proposals. But I simply do not believe that, for example, Strathclyde region or Glasgow district would have reduced its spending so substantially last year were it not for the prospect of recovering £33 million and £12 million respectively, as they will do as a result of tonight's order.

We are abandoning grant penalties after 1988-89, in recognition of the greater accountability to which local authorities will be subjected as a result of the community charge, but I believe that the efficacy of grant penalties in reducing expenditure during the year was amply demonstrated last year, and I am confident that the same will happen again.

The second point that COSLA made was to point to the potentially damaging effect of grant penalties on community charge levels next year. The obvious first rejoinder to that is that there are no penalties for authorities that spend at or within guidelines. The fact is that authorities that consciously plan to overspend, knowing the consequences, cannot properly claim that the consequences for their taxpayers are the Government's fault. The main purpose of grant penalties is to encourage authorities to reduce their expenditure in the course of the year, and to the extent that they do so the grant will be returned.

As I see it, therefore, this last year of grant penalties should be an effective instrument for lowering local authority expenditure and hence the baseline against which the first community charges will be calculated. Ratepayers should see the penalties in that light; I hope that the local authorities will do so too, and that all hon. Members representing overspending authorities will encourage them to maximise their eventual grant entitlement by reducing their expenditure as the year proceeds.

Quite apart from these specific points which COSLA put to us on 29 April, there does appear to be a general view that local authority services are being cut to the bone. My hon. Friends who look around themselves in their constituencies will not recognise this view, and they would be right. Local authority budgets for 1988-89 have increased by 4 per cent. in volume terms over actual local authority spending in 1978-79, without there having been any significant increase in authorities' statutory burdens or responsibilities in the meantime. If, rather than adjusting for local authorities' own inflation rates, which include some excessive pay settlements, we compare local authority spending with the general rate of inflation, we come up with a real increase of 22 per cent. in council spending. That is to say that local authorities are costing the economy 22 per cent. more than 10 years ago. So it is no wonder that we have had to take action.

I should now like to turn to details of the order. First, it reduces rate support grant for 1988-89 for authorities which have planned to overspend. The needs element of rate support grant has been reduced by £140·1 million. That reduction is concentrated entirely on the 31 overspenders.

The grant reduction is related directly to the individual authority's degree of overspending by comparison with guideline, on the basis of a formula which is explained in the accompanying report. In arriving at the detail of our proposals, my right hon. and learned Friend and I have paid particular heed to the pattern of overspend revealed by authorities' budgets. The main features of the penalty tariff to which I would draw attention are, first, the low starting point, so that authorities planning to spend up to 2 per cent. over guideline attract a penalty rising only to 10 per cent. of their guideline excess; but there is a maximum penalty tariff of 110 per cent. for overspends of 5 per cent. over guideline and above.

That compares with a penalty tariff last year standing at 70 per cent. and rising to 175 per cent, for spending of 3·5 per cent. in excess of guideline or above, and the reduction in grant at budget stage is broadly equivalent to the budgeted overspend. By comparison with last year, it is tailored specifically to the pattern of budgeted overspend this year. There will be limited burdens for authorities with low overspends, which may in any case be most disposed to reduce their spending to guideline as the year proceeds; but at the same time the penalty is high, with a correspondingly high incentive to economise, on those few authorities with major overspends.

I offer the House only these two examples. Lothian region now plans to reduce its spending to 4·2 per cent. over guideline, which is the average excess over guideline for all regional councils, and as a result it will recover at the end of the year more than £33 million of the grant it is now forfeiting. If Strathclyde reduces its overspend to, say, 4 per cent. it will recover more than £47 million. These are powerful incentives to reduce spending in the course of the year, and when authorities do so, the benefit will be in reduced community charges next year.

I have mentioned Lothian region's decision to make a voluntary rate and budget reduction. As a result, we have less business to debate here this evening than would otherwise have been the case, and I shall say no more on the subject other than to welcome the sensible and realistic decision that Lothian regional council has now taken.

In terms of previous years, the order contains grant adjustments to take account of provisional outturn and final outturn expenditure figures. In 1987-88, at budget stage, 28 authorities kept within guidelines and the total overspend was £123·2 million. Provisional outturns show that the number of authorities within guideline has increased to 30 and that the total overspend has come down to £74·6 million. The effect of this is to bring penalties for that year down from £202·3 million to £113·1 million, a saving of £89·2 million.

Details of the 1987-88 penalties are given in annexes 3 and 4 to the report. For those authorities affected, the revised penalties are shown in column 7 in annex 4 with the adjustments that will be made to grant payments shown in column 9. I draw particular attention to the amounts of grant being returned to Strathclyde and Lothian regions and to Edinburgh and Glasgow districts.

For 1986-87, final or near-final outturns show a small increase in spending. The effect of this is to increase penalties by £0·1 million. Details of the adjustments to penalties are shown in column 6 of table II of annex 5 to the report. For 1985-86, final outturns show a reduction in spending which has the effect of reducing penalties by £3·2 million. Details of the adjustments to penalties are shown in column 6 of table II of annex 6 to the report.

There will be a continuing need to adjust grant in the light of up-to-date information in respect of 1988-89 and previous years, but this will be the last occasion on which grant penalties will be imposed. I hope that when grant, particularly in respect of 1988-89, is further adjusted, the news for local authorities will be good, reflecting a sensible response by local authorities to the order. I commend the order to the House.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): Some of us occasionally think that the economics of the European Community is obscure, obtuse and perverse. We now find ourselves looking at the rate support grant settlement of a Conservative Government and it is no improvement on what has gone before. I should make it clear that we oppose the order.

I do not think that Conservative Governments never work; they sometimes achieve great things. I am indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) for the information that Mr. Alex Pagett, the important capture from the public sector, has just fled from Scottish Conservative party headquarters in Chester street. I am told that when challenged by the press about his reasons he said that he was taking advantage of the enterprise culture. I suppose that that proves that in this case it is not so much an alibi as an escape route. We ought to make it clear that taking Mr. Pagett was not a quid pro quo for Mr. Rio Stakis's knighthood.

The order is offensive in principle and it is on principles that I want to start. The order and the clawback represent an arbitrary judgment based on questionable guidelines that have been manipulated by Ministers with political advantage in mind. The whole attitude of the Minister to local government was well instanced in his speech. He talked about local authorities being "well warned" as if they were a collection of recalcitrant schoolchildren being reprimanded by a particularly inflexible dominie.

The Minister talked about local authorities "costing the economy". I fear that he has the impression that any expenditure by local government is essentially wicked and can be allowed only in very special and grudging circumstances. I do not like the basis of the system. I remember on one occasion in the days when we had a Scottish Select Committee a senior official in the Scottish Office talking about objective factors subjectively applied. It might have been the other way round, but in any event it became very clear that the basis on which these guidelines have operated are anything but satisfactory and are based on expediency and not on principle.

The global total for 1988-89 is based on the budget of the previous year plus 4 per cent. I think that there were one or two minor adjustments for the teachers' pay settlement and for the ever-burgeoning costs of administering the poll tax. It is interesting to note that the total is based on the budget for the previous year which does not suggest a vote of confidence in the basis on which the £202 million was clawed back in that financial year. It is not so much the total global figure with which we are concerned as the remarkable variations in the guidelines for individual local authorities.

There are, for example, increases among the regions as high as 11 per cent. for Dumfries and Galloway and 10·7 per cent. for Grampian, down to 3 per cent. for Strathclyde and 3 per cent. for Lothian region. There are substantial variations among the districts. The figures vary between 3 per cent. and, in Sutherland, 44 per cent., which I concede is out of line in every sense.

However, it is interesting to note that the authorities that have run into trouble are those whose increase in guidelines has been well below the going inflation rate and who are at the bottom of that list. Grampian, with a substantial increase in guidelines, is out of penalty altogether. Dumfries creeps in at 0·11 per cent.—that is a rather esoteric figure, if ever there was one—but Strathclyde and Lothian face the maximum penalty of 110 per cent.

The whole matter turns on Strathclyde's position. It is being hammered for another £82 million and no one could seriously imagine that the 3 per cent. increase in guidelines this year, as against last year, could accommodate, for example, the problems that it has had and the factors to which I have already referred, such as poll tax administration and increases in teachers' salaries.

It is simply a chaotic, artificial, vindictive and often illogical system. The Minister says that, last year, £202 million was clawed back, but some £89 million of that is now being returned. He says that as though it was a virtue, but it underlines the folly and complete irrelevance of what has been happening. The authorities have had to lie out of that money for up to a year. I am told by COSLA that the interest charges alone amounted to about £9 million. The fact that Strathclyde is getting back £33 million is not necessarily a success for common sense, although it may be a success for the Minister's spleen. That authority has had to struggle bravely to try and protect the ratepayers and has done so probably at the cost of dismantling some services and certainly of undermining financial stability. We should not applaud that or suggest that the Minister should encourage it.

Lothian region is in a particularly bizarre position. There has been an agreed reduction of £23 million, as the Minister said. That will come out of this year's expenditure, but the grant penalty is still being calculated on the basis that that £23 million will be spent. In addition, a penalty of 110 per cent. is being paid. Again, Lothian will have to wait for a whole year for that money to be returned, and interest charges and other expenses will accrue. How can that be in the ratepayers' interests? If the Minister is grateful for the fact that a common-sense solution, as he sees it, has been found and if, in some way, agreement has been reached with the Lothian region, surely the sensible course is to recognise what has happened and to take that £23 million out of its budget for grant calculation. I do not understand why that has not been done.

I have no doubt that the Minister of State will argue that the penalties this year are less than they were last year. The sum of £202 million last year has been replaced with a sum of £140 million. The top rate penalty has come down from 175 per cent. to 110 per cent. I must make it clear that we believe that a clawback is wrong. There is no case for that during a financial year, and particularly in a year in which the average rate increase in Scotland is as low as 5 per cent.

This is a very inappropriate order because, as the Minister pointed out, this is the last year of the old system and we face the Minister's brave new world of the poll tax. If we are to close the chapter, draw the line and start again, there is no case for carrying forward deficits into next year, the first year of the poll tax. In any event, it is a basically unsound system that has been foisted upon us without our consent and without any sort of wisdom or appreciation of the needs of Scotland or of the wishes of the Scottish people.

However, be that as it may, there is a practical argument that I should have thought would appeal to the Minister. It is not just the theory of the clean break. Inevitably, to some extent the penalties will be carried forward into the following year, and will fall specifically on the poll tax.

No doubt the Minister will argue that if authorities cut expenditure, they will cut the deficit and relieve the additional burden on the poll tax. But many authorities have come down to the bare essentials. Some, such as Strathclyde last year, managed to meet their targets in reducing expenditure in the face of the Minister's threats and sanctions by one-off savings that will be difficult to repeat.

I do not know anyone who denies that if the Minister goes ahead with the order and imposes the full penalty that is allowed, at least there will be an irreducible core of deficit that will have to be shifted into the following year, and into the calculations that make up the poll tax.

It will be particularly serious because the burden will have to be borne not by the entire rating base, but by the poll tax payers alone. The commercial and industrial ratepayers are now linked to the RPI and cannot take a share of that increase. As a result, the burden will be carried by about 40 per cent. of the rating base and that will be entirely to the disadvantage of the poll tax payer.

The Minister has said or implied that it is an advantage that the top rate of penalty has come down from 175 per cent. to 110 per cent. But allowing for the fact that the penalty will fall only on that 40 per cent. of the old rating base, to preserve parity, the penalty should be 70 per cent.

[Mr. Donald Dewar]

The impact of the order on the poll tax will vary from authority to authority. Those that are out of penalty will not be affected. However, COSLA tells me—and I have no reason to believe that it has not calculated carefully—that the impact on Strathclyde if the full penalty had to be met would be equivalent to £50 on the individual poll tax. Perhaps the Minister will say whether he accepts that figure. Even if Strathclyde manages to reduce the penalty that it has to pay, and even if it manages to cuts its expenditure, there will still be a significant push to poll tax levels for half Scotland's population. That is a practical illustration of a well-known and well-advertised consequence of the system that the Government have introduced.

During our debate on the poll tax legislation, the very factors to which I am referring were explained to the Minister. It was pointed out to him by people from the press that there was a gearing effect and, inevitably, the poll tax would rise sharply to levels which the Scottish public would consider intolerable. The Minister's answer was that local authorities would not dare to do it. That says a great deal about his attitude. He is constantly expecting local authorities to respond to his wish to dismantle services and to cut provision, when, from his point of view, no doubt, perversely, but in my view very sensibly, people vote for councils that follow other policies and want the Government to follow other policies.

It is unsatisfactory that in the last year of the present local government financial system, we will lumber local authorities and poll tax payers next year with a burden that is unfair and is a heritage from the past. The Minister knows that it is an unacceptable policy, not simply because it is the view of Opposition politicians, local government and any member of the public in Scotland who is aware and has thought through the system, but because it has been proclaimed as unacceptable by his colleagues south of the border. The Minister will be aware that when the Secretary of State for the Environment made his statement about local government finance in the House on 7 July, he made it clear that he would not follow that example. He said:

"Under my proposals for closing down the system, grant payments to authorities will not be affected by their level of spending in 1989-90."—[Official Report, 7 July; Vol. 136, c. 1200.]

The Secretary of State for the Environment was saying very sensibly that the Government have enough problems —and, good Lord, he is right—in trying to get the crazy poll tax system off the ground without burdening it and handicapping it by enforcing a series of punitive penalties in the immeidiately preceding year which will force up the levels of poll tax. Why cannot the Scottish Office take a similarly sensible decision? We want the Minister to answer that question before we vote on the order.

I suggest that the Minister should follow the English example on this occasion, take the same sensible decision and make it clear that he will abandon this series of punitive measures, this foraging expendition into local government finance. He should draw the line behind the present rate support grant system and start afresh next year. That would at least give the hard-pressed poll tax payer in Scotland some chance to come to terms with the unpleasant new system that has been foisted upon him.

This matter relates to a fundamental principle. I believe that the Government are still thirled to the idea of control, restriction and depression of local government expenditure for the sake of depression. They really look forward to inadequate services at an inflated price. We know that in 1981-82 the rate support grant settlement met 68·5 per cent. of agreed expenditure. That has now fallen to about 50 per cent. COSLA estimates that that has cost local government in Scotland about £3,000 million. Against the enormity of that disaster over recent years—a disaster for the ratepayers, despite the Government's rhetoric, and for the provision of services—the present £140 million may seem a paltry sum. This is a matter of principle and of practical importance. If the burden is passed on, it will be concentrated on those who will pay the poll tax for the first time and it may affect people who will be in the local government taxation net for the first time. That is wrong. We want none of that, and we will vote against the order.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): This important debate, regrettably, has been delayed. It should be recorded for the benefit of the people of Scotland that that delay was entirely due to the fact that a bunch of English Labour hooligans delayed the debate by forcing a completely unnecesary Division.

The case that my hon. Friend the Minister put to the House——

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): On a point of Order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May not the comments of the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) be regarded as a very serious reflection on the Chair, of which you were the occupant, when my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) was called to speak on the money resolution? Is it in order for the hon. Member for Eastwood to criticise your selection of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South to speak on the money resolution? Is that not a very serious and scurrilous attack on the occupant of the Chair?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): The comments that I heard may be judged discourteous, but they were not out of order.

Mr. Stewart: In no way was I criticising the Chair. It is a matter of regret that the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) has delayed further the proceedings of this important debate.

The case made by my hon. Friend the Minister was reasonable. It sounds generous almost to the point of excess. There is absolutely no doubt that the increased provision of 9 per cent. for 1988-89 over 1987-88 represents an increase of 4·7 per cent. on last year's budget. The penalty scale is significantly more generous than it was previously.

The system under which the order operates has worked under successive Governments. Hearing the comments of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), one would have thought that Labour Governments had never passed rate support grants that were unpopular with Labour-controlled authorities. Indeed, the reverse is the case. I am delighted to see the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Lambie) in his place, because he has an unprecedented record of voting against rate support grant orders, irrespective of which party forms the Government.

The system has worked increasingly effectively and there is no doubt that it has been effective in Lothian and Strathclyde. It is necessary because of the lack of accountability to the electorate under the rating system. I am delighted that 1988-89 will be the last year of guidelines and that they will, in effect, be stopped by the changeover to the revenue support grant and the community charge.

I followed my hon. Friend's reference to the real terms increase in council spending since 1978-79. I think that he said it was an increase of 22 per cent. Will my hon. Friend break down that figure because I understand that it varies considerably between different expenditure heads and that the figure for police expenditure has increased by only 10 per cent. compared with significantly higher figures for leisure and recreation, and social work?

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that his comments and those of the Minister have ably demonstrated why Mr. Alex Pagett has preferred to move on to the exotic offices of the Stakis organisation rather than defend the system of gomeril nonsense that we are hearing about tonight?

Mr. Stewart: That is the level of the intellectual attack on the order. That is all that Opposition Members can say. Mr. Alex Pagett can answer for himself—[HON. MEMBERS: "Can you?"] He has moved on and has said that his decision was made because he supports the enterprise culture, and so do I. It is absolutely right that people should move on when they wish to do so. The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) is trying to divert me from my reasoned appreciation——

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that none of us would be Members of this House if we had not at one point in our lives decided to change our employment? Therefore, it is humbug to criticise an individual for changing employment.

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, as always. He may agree that it is a pity that some Opposition Members chose to change their previous occupations.

Will my hon. Friend the Minister of State confirm that Strathclyde is still pursuing a unique policy of keeping its police establishment below the authorised level? Such a policy is not pursued by any other police authority in Scotland, including Labour-controlled regional authorities. As I understand the position in Strathclyde—perhaps my hon. Friend can confirm or deny this—the excess in Strathclyde's 1988-89 budget is about 5·1 per cent. If the regional council reduced that to 3 per cent., I understand that that would yield a major saving to the regional council of between £65 million and £70 million, which would be of great benefit. Such a target is not unreasonable for Strathclyde.

Furthermore, if the authority had pursued a policy of school reorganisation instead of bringing in political factors such as absurd opposition to single-sex schools which are popular with Catholics and ethnic minorities, even if unpopular with Opposition Members, it would have fared a great deal better.

Finally, speaking as a Glasgow district ratepayer, I should like to ask my hon. Friend two questions about Glasgow district council. First, it is interesting that the director of finance of Glasgow district forecast a community charge level of £529 before the district elections and subsequently revised it downward after the votes were counted. Secondly, can my hon. Friend comment on the widespread reports that Glasgow district has a substantial cash reserve, which has been put at between £30 million and £40 million? Clearly, it must have a contingency reserve, but, as my hon. Friend may know, that has been controversial and criticised not only by Government supporters but from within the Labour movement.

Finally, next year we shall see the introduction of the community charge and an end to these orders. Will my hon. Friend confirm that over 90 per cent. of community charge canvasses have been returned and that the various assembled and spurious campaigns from the different Opposition parties have failed?

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): There appears to be a general welcome that this may be the last time we debate the system of clawbacks. The hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) has just stated the basis of his support and the House will undoubtedly draw its conclusions, and I have little difficulty in welcoming an end to these debates. The system of clawbacks has been deeply damaging to local government and offensive to local democracy. I say that to some extent invested with authority from the fact that the district council whose boundaries exactly coincide with those of my constituency did not until 1984, during the time when it was Conservative-controlled, contrive to produce a budget within guidelines. Only when the administration changed in 1984 and since then have budgets within guidelines been produced.

What is deeply offensive about the present system is that it allows the Secretary of State to override the decisions of elected local councillors. The proper course is for those who make budgets and are responsible for expenditure to face the consequences of those decisions when they meet the electorate.

The truth is that the political purpose of clawbacks has not been realised because the public in general have responded adversely to centralisation and appreciated that a substantial part of the discretion of their local councillors is being taken away. The measure of the public's adverse reaction is found in the fact that not a single council which has been penalised under the clawback provisions has been reclaimed by the Conservative party. If anything, in authorities which have suffered most, the majorities against the Government party have increased substantially.

The community charge is about to become part of local government finance in Scotland.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): The poll tax.

Mr. Campbell: I accept that it may now be called the poll tax. The hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth), the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, referred to it in those terms during Scottish questions, and on such matters he must for this limited purpose at least be regarded as something of an authority.

I welcome the fact that the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities was consulted on this occasion and that the clawback has been less severe than in previous years. But that may not be unrelated to the fact that the poll tax is coming into operation. As the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) pointed out, the higher the penalty this year, so much higher may be the effect on the community charge next year. The burden will fall largely on those who pay the community charge or poll tax in the domestic sector, and I wait with interest, as I suspect does the House, to find out why there is to be this distinction in principle between Scotland and England. The distinction is hard to understand and I suspect that the Minister will find it even more difficult to justify when he winds up.

The effect of clawback is to withdraw £140 million from the economy of Scotland. Its immediate effect must be a reduction in services and many of the services that will be adversely affected are those relied upon by the poor, the elderly and the disadvantaged. It is not the rich, the young or the gifted who are the beneficiaries of the services that will inevitably require to be cut. One listens to the Government explain their position, but it is notable that absent from the advice that they seem willing to give local authorities is advice on precisely what services should be cut. In a matter of responsibility, the Government seem willing to leave that problem to the duly elected local councillors.

This is a Government who are supposed to be concerned about local government finance, responsibility and accountability. The truth is that they have presided over more centralisation and less accountability. The clawback has been an unhappy chapter in local government funding in Scotland. It has not achieved what the Government intended and it has weakened and had an adverse effect on local democracy. No tears will be shed when it comes to an end. Likewise, when the order is put to the vote, I doubt very much whether it will command support in the House other than that of the vast ranks of English Tory Members who have contrived to find compelling obligations outside the Chamber and who will troop into the Government Lobby and pass the order, just as one might expect. I wonder whether they would be as keen to pass it if the Secretary of State for the Environment had not made the announcement that he did last week.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) clearly showed why his party has been so long out of government and looks likely not to be in government in future years. His speech was typical of his party. It was full of aspects about what life should, could and may be, but not about good management and organisation, with accountability and responsibility.

The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the clawback system was unpopular. I agree. It is unpopular with individuals in local government who knew full well that under the rating system there was not the accountability that the hon. and learned Gentleman talked about because under that system too few people paid and the majority did not pay, so those individuals were able to vote for expenditure, knowing full well that they would not have to pay for it. That is why there there was lack of accountability. So I am delighted that this is the last of the orders that we shall deal with.

One of the great advantages of the community charge will be the responsibility and accountability that the hon. and learned Gentleman seems to imagine existed under the rating system. He called it local democracy. There was nothing democratic about people passing massive expenditure that they knew their supporters would not have to pay for. That is what happened so often. It is gradually coming to an end, and not too soon.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Walker: I am delighted to give away to the hon. Gentleman who represents a party of one in the House.

Mr. Brown: When we speak about the rate support grant, we must understand one thing. That contribution to local government does not come from the Tory party; it comes from the people, the working class, who pay into a kitty that should go into local government. That has been cut repeatedly by the Government. Millions of pounds have been diverted towards other areas, particularly armaments, Trident and so on. So it is dishonest of the hon. Gentleman to suggest that it is simply a matter of the rating system being discredited. Who discredited it? The system has been discredited by the hon. Gentleman's own party. If his Government owned up and made sure that the moneys were available to local government, the rating system would not be so bad.

Mr. Bill Walker: We now know why the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Brown) is a party of one at the moment. He has clearly illustrated that he does not know how taxation works, or that the income tax reductions given by the Government have gone to ordinary people, the taxpayers. He may not believe that the people have welcomed that, but I know of no one who has given their tax refunds back to the Exchequer under any pretext.

The Government have pursued a policy of attempting to control local authority expenditure. I stress "attempting" because it has not been possible to control it as one would wish. To suggest that, somehow, there has been a massive reduction in the services provided locally is nonsense. In my part of the world, services have improved in recent years and have not been decimated as the Opposition have sought to suggest. There have been substantial improvements in many of the sectors covered by local government and that has largely occurred because of the additional sums that have been made available to it. The money can only come from the taxpayer; there is no one else. Central Government have no money and local government has no money—it is provided either from central taxation or from local taxation. It is nonsense if the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith believes that there is a pot of gold that can be got at.

I believe that my hon. Friend the Minister may have been over-generous in his approach to this matter, but whatever reason the Opposition believe lies behind my stance, I still believe that there are authorities that plan to spend much more than the guidelines. The guidelines were introduced by a Labour Government and it was a Labour Government who first ran into trouble with the local authorities about planned overspending.

How lovely it is to have the selective memory of the Opposition, who forget the years between 1974 and 1979 and all the accompanying traumas. The only time there were massive reductions in local government expenditure was during that period. Since that time there have been substantial increases and it looks as if we are budgeting for a 9 per cent. increase. By any measure that is generous.

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): Tonight we experienced the long-awaited moment when the Minister said something memorable.

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): About Alex Pagett;.

Mr. Worthington: It was nothing to do with Alex Pagett, it was when he said that, in the past three years, local government had been costing the economy more. The Government's attitude to local government has never been expressed more clearly.

If one spends any money on local government the implication is that that is parasitical on the economy and dragging it down. Therefore, one must stop building roads. One must stop flushing the lavatory because that it is damaging the economy. One must stop running the tap because it is costing the economy. One must stop asking for a home help because that is costing the economy. One must not have a police or a fire service because that is costing the economy. If my son or daughter says that they want to continue to go to school they must be stopped because that is costing the economy. Nothing has exposed more clearly the Government's attitude to the local authorities, and it is the most insulting one that they could have. It is especially insulting to local government staff, many of whom are especially fine people doing a fine job. The same can be said of councillors. But the Government consider that local government is a cost to the economy. The Minister will suffer for his comment because it reveals clearly the Government's view of local authorities. There will be no end to the restrictions placed on local authorities because any local authority expenditure will be seen by central Government as a cost to the economy.

We are told that this is the last time that we shall have the rate support grant farce. Is that right? Under the poll tax, there will be a similar debate next year when the Government have decided how they will distribute money among local authorities. There will have to be a formula, and the debate will be the same.

I should like to know whether my conclusions on the Government's policies are correct. I estimate that in future about 80 per cent. of local authority expenditure will be controlled by central Government grant and that the business rate will be controlled also by central Government. I assume that about 20 per cent. of local authority expenditure will be controlled by local authorities. It is my experience in local government—I am sure that it was the experience also of my right hon. and hon. Friends—that the Government never provided adequately for inflation. The technique of control has been to say that inflation will be lower than it has turned out to be.

If four fifths of local authority expenditure is controlled by central Government and one fifth by local government, and if the inflation level is 4 per cent. and the Government provide for 3 per cent., the poll tax will have to increase by 8 per cent. for inflation alone. Is that correct? If the level is 5 per cent. and the Government provide for 4 per cent., is it correct that the authorities will have to find 9 per cent. extra in poll tax? If the level is 6 per cent. and the Government provide for 4 per cent., will the poll tax have to increase by 14 per cent? If inflation is 6 per cent. and the Government provide for 3 per cent., will the poll tax have to increase by 18 per cent? The answer to my questions is yes because it is easy to make the necessary calculations. That being so, how can we talk about local accountability? The behaviour of central Government will determine local government expenditure.

In the settlement for this year, Lothian, Strathclyde and 11 district councils had a provision for inflation of 3 per cent. Inflation for local authorities is running at 6 per cent. If the pattern continues, the poll tax will have to increase by 18 per cent. The gearing effect is such that a local authority region such as Dumfries and Galloway, which this year was given provision for an 11 per cent. increase in its expenditure—that was arranged for it by a local and convenient Minister—would have to find some money for the poll tax in the circumstances that I have postulated.

After repeated attempts to obtain an answer from the Government, I now want an answer on the uniform business rate. According to the Tory argument, high local government expenditure has driven jobs away from areas, and one reason why they control the business rate is to protect businesses. However, in Scotland, we have the worst of all possible worlds. They have said that they will take the existing business rate set by Strathclyde, Dumfries and Galloway or Lothian and index-link it. They said that they will not harmonise it within Scotland, but they will maintain it in perpetuity.

What is the logic of that? The logic should be that one would seek to harmonise within Scotland and have a uniform business rate for Scotland, but we will not get that. Why? Dumfries and Galloway would lose—its rates would increase by 40 per cent.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): It is rigged.

Mr. Worthington: As my hon. Friend says, it is rigged. However, the much bigger issue is when will the Government come clean about when they will introduce a uniform business rate for England, Wales and Scotland. It is not just the Opposition who are concerned about that, but the CBI, the Scottish Council (Development and Industry) and the chambers of commerce. They see Scotland losing substantially because, when a uniform business rate is introduced in England and Wales, there will be a transfer of resources from the south of England to the north. The substantial advantage that is already enjoyed by the north of England in comparison with rates in Scotland will become even greater.

In Scotland, businesses pay between two and two and a half times as much in business rates as they would in the north of England. To compare the midlands with Scotland, the national exhibition centre, which is five times the size of the Scottish exhibition centre, pays the same rates. That disadvantage will be made even worse.

When the Minister was questioned, he said that he could not anticipate what will happen, because the revaluation has not been carried out. Other sections of the Government have done that. A Treasury Paper called "Running Costs Guidance: Location of Work", issued in March 1988, said:

> "The effects of the uniform rate poundage in England are expected to include a reduction in average rates bills in much of the North and Midlands."

That is official.

The Scottish Council (Development and Industry), the Scottish CBI, the chambers of commerce and the Opposition cannot obtain an answer from the Government on why there will be a £300 million disadvantage to Scottish industry, starting in 1990. The chief executive of the Scottish Tories, John MacKay—of beloved memory—admitted that there would be a period of at least 10 years from 1990 to the year 2000 when Scottish business would be disadvantaged to that extent, and the Government appear to be taking no note of that. Why will the Minister not tell us why a different rate of taxation is to be imposed on Scottish businesses as compared with businesses in the north of England?

12.9 am

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): I note that the Conservative party has run out of speakers. I shall speak briefly to allow the maximum number of speakers from the Opposition, because it is important that the voice of Scotland in opposition to this disgraceful measure is heard as fully as possible.

The point of the order is to withdraw about £140 million from the local government system in Scotland—money that could be used to provide services, create employment and allow local authorities to maintain and increase their standards of service. The people of Scotland will be the losers from the order, because it will affect the provision of services to individuals, families and the business community.

The Government have a clear and consistent policy of withdrawing financial support from local authorities, which has the inevitable consequence of poorer services or higher rates bills, and, as the Government also operate a clawback penalty system, the inevitable consequences of the order will be poorer local government services for the people. It is yet another example of how central Government are destroying Scottish local government. By this order they are removing £140 million from local authorities' budgets, but at the same time they load new legislation and new financial burdens on the system. The idea of runaway local government spending is a myth, and apart from a few maverick exceptions, the reality is of a highly competent, professional and effective local government system in Scotland coping daily with myriad needs.

The real culprit in rates increases—demonstrably so if one studies the excellent academic work by Dr. Arthur Midwinter and others in our universities—is the withdrawal by central Government of rate support grant funding, and with this order the Government are at it again. They have presided over a massive deliberate withdrawal of funds from Scottish local authorities. Between 1978-79 and 1988-89, the cumulative reduction in local authority grant, calculated at 1988-89 figures, was £1,930 million. Government policy has impoverished local government services at district, regional and island council levels. No national organisation can readily absorb such punishment, and the victim of the Government's policy of loading new responsibilities on to local authorities at the same time as withdrawing their funds is the provision of services to local people.

The Government have acted unfairly towards Scottish local authorities, and their policy must affect every ratepayer. COSLA says:

"The Secretary of State has already agreed that the penalty system will be withdrawn as from 1 April 1989 and the imposition of the £140 million penalty in the current year will create a situation whereby community charges will require to be considerably higher than would otherwise have been the case. Unless service levels are reduced penalties will be carried over into 1989/90 and rest solely with community charge payers."

We should contrast the Scottish Office treatment of poll tax payers with the position in England, where no penalties will be applied in the final year. No wonder that COSLA feels that a similar arrangement should apply to Scotland. We are entitled to ask the Government—and to receive an answer tonight—why Scotland should be treated less fairly than England over the poll tax.

The order is typical of the cavalier and unfair treatment meted out to local authorities by successive Governments. It is unfair and it will create massive and unnecessary problems for the local authorities. It should be rejected.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): Once again I intend to respond to the disgraceful attack on the integrity of the director of finance of Glasgow district council. This person has been accused of telling the council, and thereby the Glasgow public, what it suits the Labour administration to hear. I worked closely with Mr. English for several years. I know from direct experience that he would not shirk telling the council what it did not want to hear. He is not a person who seeks to curry favour. That attack says much more about the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) than about Mr. English.

The hon. Member for Eastwood said that he thought that the clawback of rate support grant was justified, on the peculiar ground that Glasgow district council carries a large contingency fund or surplus. That is pretty strange reasoning. The Government say that it relates purely to overspend. They would be delighted if councils amassed funds and did not spend them on services, but according to the hon. Member for Eastwood they are being punished for doing so. He knows that Glasgow district council held its rate steady for several years and that this year there was a slight decrease. It is not about vastly increased rates or about holding a surplus; it is supposed to be about excessive and unreasonable expenditure.

As the average increase was only 3 per cent., do the Minister and the hon. Member for Eastwood think that 3 per cent. was excessive and unreasonable? [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Eastwood wants to intervene, I might allow him to do so, but I do not intend to respond to stupid interruptions from a sedentary position. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. There are too many sedentary interruptions from both sides of the House. I should very much like to listen to the hon. Lady's speech.

Mrs. Fyfe: But the sedentary interruptions on this side of the House are supportive.

I shall put some questions to the Minister, not in the hope that he will answer them but to have them on record. I fully expect the Minister to do what he has done on previous occasions at the Dispatch Box and to avoid answering my questions. Does he accept that inflation, poll tax administration and teachers' salaries account for the majority of the budgeted excess that the order intends to penalise? If so, does he think that that is fair, or will he admit that it is a blatant attempt to force real cuts?

Does the Minister think that a 3 per cent. increase on the previous year's budgets was excessive and unreasonable? If so, does he think that anybody else thinks that it was excessive and unreasonable? If not, why is the majority of the penalty falling on those authorities whose budgets have increased by only 3 per cent.? What justification can there be for the top level of penalty exceeding more than a pound for pound loss of grant? Does he intend to impose £100 on two adults in a household in the first year of the poll tax, or does he hope that those councils will make drastic budget cuts and thereby provide a worse service than the people voted for in recent district elections, in the previous regional elections and in the general election?

Does he believe that the domestic sector—we are talking local government jargon here, but everyone in the House ought to know that "domestic sector" means ordinary families and not business ratepayers—should bear the burden, when they represent only 40 per cent. of the total rating base?

Finally, how can the Minister explain the imposition of this penalty on Scotland, when the Secretary of State for the Environment dare not impose any such penalty on England?

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton): The order concerns £140 million that is being withdrawn from 1 April 1989, but £136 million of that—over 97 per cent.—is a result of the Government's negligence in refusing to reflect the rate of inflation in rate support resettlement grants over the past six or seven years. Only £4 million is a consequence of local authorities' actions. That means that poll tax levels will have to be higher than they would otherwise have been, as the penalties will have to be carried forward.

During the past six months we have heard that the Scottish legislation and that for England and Wales will come into line in defining such categories as the severely mentally handicapped. Why, then, can the Minister not pledge that these penalties will not be carried forward for 12 months, as the Secretary of State for the Environment did in his statement of 7 July in regard to England and Wales? Otherwise, next April, Scotland will have the poll tax along with rate capping, and it will be unique in that respect. If the Government want to be fair, why cannot they give us the same pledge that the Secretary of State for the Environment gave to England and Wales?

The penalty figures suggest that an average coupie in Strathclyde region will have to pay an extra £100. That will destroy at a stroke the so-called link between spending and accountability to which the Government have referred during the past six, 12 or 18 months. It will also destroy the link between spending and the poll tax charge.

In future the Government will provide about 80 per cent. of local authorities' funds, with the authorities having to find the rest. If anything, that is a centralising measure. The Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy has carried out a survey over the past few months of nearly 50 local authorities in England and Wales. It found that, on the figures available, in about 26 authorities poll tax levels would go up while the authorities' spending fell. In 22, they found the opposite. There is no accountability, and carrying forward the penalties will only penalise Scottish poll taxpayers even more.

It is said that the tariff will be reduced from 175 to 110 per cent. As my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) has said, the burden will fall entirely on the domestic sector. I well remember in the past few years asking Strathclyde regional council to petition the Government to save social projects in our area—projects such as latchkey schemes and schemes to help alcoholics. Not only did the Government not save the projects but they penalised Strathclyde regional council 110 per cent. over budget because the council had a conscience and decided to save them.

If the Government have any conscience, they should let the poll tax payers in Scotland start with a clean sheet. As my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) said, over the past few years rate support grant has fallen from 68·5 per cent. in 1981 to 50 per cent. now. If the order is passed, there will be a total loss of £3 billion. Translated into its value in terms of rates, that means that poll tax payers in Scotland from next year would be entitled to a two-year rate-free period if the money were reinstated.

The problems of local government are nothing to do with local authorities, which have done their best to balance the books and provide services of all kinds over the past seven years. Their problems stem from the actions of the Government. If the Government have any conscience they will cancel the penalties that are being carried over to next year and let the poll tax payers of Scotland start with a clean sheet.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): We have heard the Minister castigate Strathclyde regional council. It was not so long ago that the previous Secretary of State for Scotland, the right hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger), went around the world praising that council as an excellent, prudent and responsible authority. The council is in an area of huge deprivation, made worse since the Government came to power in 1979. Since then, the Government have cut almost £2 billion from Strathclyde alone.

Since 1979, deprived areas have got worse; in 1979 there were 45—now 78 are so designated. I can see the Secretary of State having a wee laugh. I can assure him that people in Strathclyde are not laughing at the damage inflicted on them by the Government.

The Minister mentioned local government guidelines. When Dick Stewart was leader of Strathclyde regional council he said that no one could tell it what the guidelines were. The figures were mythical, picked out of a hat. The officers and councillors of Strathclyde would learn more from the "Hitchhiker's Guide to the Galaxy" than from what the Scottish Office puts out.

It is appalling that the Minister is attacking Strathclyde, given that it looks after nearly half the population of Scotland—2,500,000 people who are waiting with trepidation for the poll tax to be implemented. If the Minister goes ahead with the clawback there will be a lot of weeping and wailing in Strathclyde because of the damage that that would inflict on the area. For the first time ever, the council would have to consider cutting home helps, concessionary fares, social work and services for the elderly—and the police. That would be a tragedy. The Government should reverse the policy of clawback and give the people of Strathclyde some hope and some future to look forward to.

Instead of castigating Strathclyde, the Government should start to give it a bit of support. They should give some encouragement to local councillors to carry out their mandate. Those councillors were democratically elected and the number of Labour councillors has increased. They have not lost seats but have gained seats at every election. The people of Strathclyde have shown that they wish to have Labour-controlled councils and no Tories.

12.30 am

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Everything that my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham) has said is true. Perhaps the most eloquent comments were the horse laughs of ignorance from Conversative Members in response to the references to poverty in Strathclyde. At other times Conservative Members, and especially Scottish Office Ministers, seek to exploit the achievements of Glasgow and Strathclyde, but when it comes to the bit, the mass of people in those places need Government financial support to give them a decent standard of living and the decent housing and services that they desperately require.

Ministers are only too happy to participate in the PR. With one hand they seek to take the credit for the achievements of Glasgow and Strathclyde and with the other they take away the resources that Glasgow, Strathclyde and other districts in Strathclyde so badly need.

Scottish Office Ministers are making a deliberate and cynical attempt to raise the starting point of the poll tax in Scotland. That is what the measure is about. If the people of Scotland take note of nothing else that comes out of the debate, they must take note of the contrast between what the Secretary of State for Scotland and his sidekick the Minister of State are doing compared to what is happening in England. What they are doing is in direct contrast to the words of the Secretary of State for the Environment who specifically said that no grant penalty system would operate in England in the final year before the introduction of the community charge. He said:

"Under my proposals for closing down the system, grant payments to authorities will not be affected by their level of spending in 1989-90."—[Official Report, 7 July 1988; Vol. 136, c. 1200.]

Those words and their contrast to what Scottish Office Ministers are about tonight could not be more specific. Ministers are forcing up the level of poll tax in Scotland in some confused hope of gaining political advantage.

We have had news tonight of the departure from office of Mr. Alex Pagett, hired less than a year ago as the propaganda minister for the Vichy regime in New St. Andrew's house. It was discreditable for Mr. Pagett to take the job in the first place, but credit is due to him for, within a few months, saying that he has no stomach for the task of acting as propagandist-in-chief for dishonest Ministers who consistently seek to impose on the people of Scotland policies for which they were not elected. Those policies have no popular mandate in Scotland and can be imposed only by what the Secretary of State for Scotland calls the Gatling gun. If the Government choose to rule by the Gatling gun they cannot expect any respect from the Opposition or from the electors in Scotland. They cannot even retain the loyalty of the hirelings that they have brought in to retrieve the discredited name of the Conservative party in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: It is conventional to say at this stage that the debate has been interesting and sometimes productive. The only substantive point of any novelty that has emerged in this debate is the Pagett point. I am happy to be able to assure the House of Mr. Pagett's departure does not incur penalty and will not affect the guidelines of the Scottish Conservative party. Our guideline remains the prudent handling of the economy, and that is evidenced by the order.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) raised a number of matters and claimed that Strathclyde and Lothian were being hammered. He carefully played down the point that Strathclyde was budgeting no less than £75 million over its guideline and that Lothian was about £40 million over budget.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) pointed out, if the authority were to reduce its guidelines by just 1 per cent., it would reduce its penalty by £44 million. If it reduced it by 2 per cent., its saving would be over £66 million. There is a strong and clear incentive to the Strathclyde local authority to reduce its spending for the sake of its ratepayers and for the sake of its community charge payers next year. As Opposition Members have said, the penalties will be carried forward to the community charge, but, by the same token, a deduction in spending will also carry forward a benefit to the community charge payers next year.

When the hon. Member for Garscadden suggests that the local authorities would have some difficulty in meeting those targets, I should again point out to him that the guidelines this year are 4·7 per cent. up on last year's budgets and no less than 8·3 per cent. up on guidelines.

The hon. Gentleman made a bizarre point about the gearing of the community charge.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lang: I am sorry, but I have no time to give way.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the effect that the penalty would have on community charge payers. Community charge payers will face a burden next year if spending is not reduced to guideline, but it works the other way round, and the benefit to community charge payers can be considerable.

Suddenly my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has become the hero of the Labour Benches, as a result of his announcement that there will be no penalty in England in the year before the introduction of the community charge. The impact of that is, of course, that grant penalty will end in Scotland and in England in the same year. I should have thought that the Opposition Benches would have welcomed that. If we do something in Scotland before they do it in England, we are being guinea pigs. If we do it after them, we are being lemmings. If we do it at the same time, we are accused of being copycats.

Mr. Dewar rose——

Mr. Lang: I shall not give way, as I have only two minutes left.

The hon. Gentleman raised the question of cuts in the rate support grant and the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond)——

Mr. Tom Clarke: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. On a major issue of this kind—it is almost a constitutional issue—influenced by the policy in Cabinet, which the Secretary of State for Scotland has accepted, would it not be in order, even at this last minute——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. That is not a point of order for the Chair. I call Mr. Lang.

Mr. Lang: The hon. Member for Garscadden raised the question of cuts in the rate support grant, a familiar old story. He forgot to refer the House to the fact that the last Labour Government, in two successive years, cut the rate support grant by a total of no less than 6·5 per cent. No cut by any Conservative Government has ever come close to that. The hon. Gentleman also forgot that the average aggregate Exchequer grant has been increased considerably. Over the past five years, it has risen by 23 per cent. inflation has risen by 25 per cent., yet rates have risen by 52 per cent.

The hon. Gentleman referred to grant penalties as artificial, vindictive and arbitrary, but let him reflect on the history of grant penalties and recall that it was a Labour Government who brought in grant penalties in the first place—admittedly, as a crude and high-handed mechanism for controlling local authorities. We have considerably improved and refined the system, first, by excluding authorities below guideline from penalty, which were penalised under the last Labour Government; secondly, by relating penalties directly to overspend, instead of the crude impost of the last Labour Government; and, thirdly, by providing for the penalties to be revised both at provisional and at outturn stages. We now have a tariff that impacts moderately on low-spending—

It being one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14.

RESTORATION OF POSSESSION AND SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE

'The Court may, on application by summary petition—

(a) order the restoration of possession of any real or personal property of the possession of which the petitioner may have been violently or fraudulently deprived; and

(b) order the specific performance of any statutory duty, under such conditions and penalties (including fine and imprisonment, where consistent with the enactment concerned) in the event of the order not being implemented, as to the Court seem proper.'.

—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

12.49 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I beg to move, That the clause be now read a Second time.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Miss Betty Boothroyd): With this it will be convenient to discuss Government new clause 2 and Government amendments Nos. 1 to 3.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In speaking to new clause 1, I shall speak also to the second new clause and to three amendments. I intend to propose them en bloc because none involves amendments to the law.

The main amendment is made by new clause 2, which concerns section 89 of the Court of Session Act 1868. The Scottish Law Commission's original view, as recorded in its report on this consolidation measure, was that this provision should be repealed in its entirety since it related to the Bill Chamber which was abolished in 1933. However, the commission has now reconsidered that view and wishes to restrict the appeal to those parts of section 89 which specifically relate to Bill Chamber proceedings.

Accordingly, new clause 2 re-enacts those provisions of section 89 which cannot be regarded as wholly obsolete as relating to the Bill Chamber and which relate to the powers of the Court of Session. For example, an interdict normally prevents an action, but section 89 of the 1868 Act also allows the granting of specific relief. Therefore, it is desirable that that power should be retained so that there is no doubt about the extent of the court's powers.

In order to achieve parity of treatment in the Bill of section 89 and section 91 of the 1868 Act, new clause 1 re-enacts also those provisions in section 91 which are not obsolete. Section 91 is similar in nature to section 89 of the 1868 Act and it should be helpful to practitioners if both provisions are dealt with in the Bill in the same manner —[Interruption.] Well, the point is that unless a provision is entirely obsolete it should not be rubbed out of existence without the House expressing a view on it. The point is that we are consolidating the law.

Amendments Nos. 1 to 3 are purely technical amendments. They are aimed at making clear which of the repealed provisions are re-enacted in the Bill or are repealed without re-enactment.

The noble and learned Lord, Lord Oliver of Aylmerton, the chairman of the Joint Committee on Consolidation Bills, has been consulted on the amendments. He has stated that he is of the view that they are appropriate to a consolidation Bill and further that the amendments do not change the legal effect of the Bill. That is what the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) was concerned about. Therefore, I commend the new clauses and amendments to the House.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Not having understood a single word that the Minister said, I should point out that even in a Committee of the whole House, it is unusual for the Government's Deputy Chief Whip to make any intervention, whether from a sedentary position or not. I should assure the hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) that I do not think that I was the only hon. Member who had difficulty in understanding what the Minister was saying. Indeed, I have a grave suspicion that the Minister himself did not understand what on earth he was saying. However, he read well from his notes and I accept that he is quite a good reader, but it is putting it a bit strongly to say that he actually understood it.

This is a consolidation measure. It had its Second Reading debate and I gather was printed some weeks ago. What I want to know is what evidence has appeared in the courts in Scotland, in the Court of Session, in the weeks between the printing of the Bill and this Committee stage or even since Second Reading.

The Minister said that it was originally believed that these clauses had fallen out of use and were no longer needed on the statute book. The only reason for reintroducing them is that in the past two weeks they have come back into use in the courts. Surely the Minister can give us examples of how this has come about. There must be a reason behind it. If not, why were they not included in the original Bill?

The Minister's explanation is unsatisfactory. He might have given us a fuller explanation of exactly what the new clauses do and why they are now necessary when two weeks ago they were not. I hope that the Minister will spend a few minutes giving us that explanation. If that is the sort of nonsense that Alex Pagett was having to sell, I am not surprised that he chucked it.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): Less than a week ago we heard the Minister tell the House that this was an uncontroversial consolidation measure which should not occupy the time of the House. We now find him compelled to move two new clauses and three consequential amendments. One is bound to ask what the Minister knew and when he came to know it. How is it that an uncontroversial measure suddenly requires new clauses and consequential amendments?

The Minister's explanation of new clause 1 was less than convincing. I understand that it relates to section 91 of the Court of Session Act 1868. That section has been in use in the Court of Session since the passing into law of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 when, in the absence of a system of judicial review in Scotland, recourse was frequently made to section 91 in an endeavour to persuade local authorities to discharge their statutory responsibilities. It is unconvincing that the draftsmen should have failed to take proper account of that when the section was in use and a matter of some judicial controversy in the past 12 years. I hope that this is not a measure of the standard of draftsmanship that we may expect.

The Minister knows that I have been pressing him for some time in questions and I asked again on Second Reading for a proper review of Court of Session procedure. Many people believe that that is a necessary accompaniment to the proper use of the Court of Session and its relevance to modern practice. I hope that if such a review is embarked on, the standard of draftsmanship which accompanies it will not be the same as that which apparently allowed these mistakes to occur in what we were told was an uncontroversial and consolidating measure.

Both new clauses create remedies in the Court of Session. It is not clear in either case whether the new clauses provide that the remedies should be available on an interim basis. New clause 1, which deals with the restoration of possession and specific performance, does not make any reference to whether such remedies may be available on an interim basis. Likewise, new clause 2 does not make any express reference to whether specific relief may be granted in interdict proceedings on an interim basis.

I hope that the Minister will take a little time to answer those points, which, in my respectful judgment, have some substance and may have important legal consequences in the Court of Session and, indeed, the law of Scotland.

It is perhaps unfortunate that these matters come before us at the end of a long day, because at another time those of us who know a little more about the procedure of the Court of Session might have been persuaded to press the Minister a little more vigorously. Perhaps the lengthy day has operated to the Minister's advantage. But I hope that he will accept that my observations are prompted by nothing other than a desire, which I have no doubt he shares, to ensure that the law of Scotland in this unitary Parliament receives the proper consideration that it deserves and that we pass into law, even by way of consolidation, only measures that are apt and appropriate and are not the subject of faulty draftsmanship.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Law Commission reconsidered its view because it noticed that a genuine error had been made by those responsible for drafting. I take full responsibility, although I did not draft every word personally. Acts going back to 1594 were being consolidated and obsolete provisions were being omitted, and one error was made in this case. As soon as it was picked up, we acted on it at once and came back to the House.

Mr. Maxton: Where did the Law Commission meet to take that decision?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am not sure whether there was a formal meeting. The Law Commission's view was firmly imparted and we are acting on it. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I am faithfully recording what that view was. It is clear that that was the Law Commission's view.

Mr. Maxton: It may well be the Law Commission's view, but many Opposition Members do not know who the members of the commission are, how many they are and how, if they did not have a formal meeting, they came to a decision that has been put so clearly to the Minister. How on earth did they come to the decision, or was it just the chairman or the clerk who decided that a mistake had been made?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Law Commission does not put forward recommendations unless it has given them the most thorough and complete consideration. I have no regrets whatever about supporting the commission in this connection.

The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) asked about whether the provisions would apply on an interim basis. The present provisions do not deal with interim orders. I should make that clear. I have no hesitation in coming back to the House to admit that there was an error.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Has the Minister noticed that while learned people such as my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) and the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) are here, only one party is not represented at this dissection of Scots law?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I note what the hon. Gentleman says about the absence of the Scottish National party.

I end by saying that the lesser the man who is not wiser today than he was yesterday. I have great enthusiasm in proposing these corrections.

Science and Mathematics Teachers

1.6 am

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn. [Mr. Lightbown.]

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): I am grateful for the opportunity to have an Adjournment debate on the current shortage of physics and mathematics teachers in schools. I am also grateful to the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science for attending at this late hour to reply. The shortage has serious implications for the education of our children and also for Britain's industrial, commercial and technological prospects in the future.

The shortage of physics and mathematics teachers has been a matter of concern for some time and the recent publication of a disturbing report commissioned by the Engineering Council, the Headmasters Conference and the Secondary Heads Association is relevant. Over the years, the Engineering Council has been considering ways in which to increase the number of engineering places in higher education, and that matter was raised during a recent debate on engineering in the House.

The council found that not enough young people were coming forward from the schools and inevitably it began to consider the quality and quantity of mathematics and physics teachers. There is no doubt about the potential and ability of our young people, because just over a week ago Britain won the gold medal in the international school physics olympiad held in Bad Ischl in Austria. The talent is present and our young people have the ability to do well in the subjects.

The report was prepared by Professor Alan Smithers and Dr. Pamela Robinson of Manchester university and it serves to heighten concern about the matter. Obviously it is essential to prevent the problem from growing worse.

The origins of our present difficulties can be traced back, in part at least, to the changes in the education system since the 1960s. The disappearance of grammar and technical schools and their replacement with comprehensive schools, many now without sixth forms, reduced the availability of some of the more challenging and rewarding teaching posts in both subjects. The recent downgrading of the requirements at A-level and GCSE makes school a less satisfactory preparation for advanced university physics and mathematics.

A significant proportion of those teaching mathematics and physics at secondary level lack adequate qualifications to do so. Therefore, there is a hidden shortage of teachers in those subjects. The 1984 secondary school staffing survey showed that 13 per cent. of mathematics teachers and 18 per cent. of physics teachers were without higher education qualifications in those subjects. If those who study maths and physics as subsidiary subjects in higher education are included in the definition of the fully qualified, the figures rise to 28 per cent. and 29 per cent. respectively. According to the 1986 document of the Department of Education and Science, "Action on Teacher Supply in Mathematics, Physics and Technology", only 45 per cent. of mathematics tuition and 57 per cent. of physics tuition was being provided by graduates in those subjects.

The same problem arises in other subjects, including chemistry. I am interested and pleased to note that the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson), who I know is concerned with the Royal Society of Chemistry, is in his place.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): May I intervene?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): With permission?

Mr. Thompson: With permission, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Anderson: The hon. Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) will be aware of the concern of the Royal Society of Chemistry that urgent action is required to increase the supply of chemists into teaching. The hon. Gentleman will know that there are special initiatives in play in physics, for example, which have resulted in an improvement in numbers. In 1985 there were 255 post-graduate certificate of education courses, which was improved to 527. Surely the hon. Gentleman will agree that no such action is proposed by the Department of Education and Science for chemistry. That must be wrong when we take account of the public interest. The number of candidates presenting themselves for a postgraduate certificate in chemistry is down by one third this year compared with the figure for last year. Is it not proper that there should be similar bonuses and initiatives for chemistry, where the problem is even more marked than in the other disciplines?

Mr. Thomspon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. The survey on which I based my remarks was directed especially to physics and mathematics. On receiving correspondence from the Royal Society of Chemistry, I was as surprised and concerned as the hon. Gentleman. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science will respond to this issue along with the other matters that I am raising.

An especially alarming feature of the results of the survey on qualifications that was conducted by Manchester university is the disparities that it has revealed. Only a quarter of the staff in maintained schools with pupils up to the age of 16 years were trained graduates. There were twice as many in schools in the maintained sectors, with students up to 18. There were almost three times as many independent schools. This means that at the earlier stage of education the hidden shortage is worst.

It is equally clear that some schools have responded to the lack of mathematics and physics teachers by adjusting their timetables. Typically, this has been done by reducing the number of subject periods per set and by limiting the number of sets. This had occurred in five of the 26 schools surveyed for mathematics and in four of the 26 for physics that were included in the Manchester university study. We therefore have a vicious cirle. A lack of qualified teachers leads to a reduction of subject time allowed. That leads to a lack of enthusiastic young people taking these subjects to a higher level. The vicious circle can continue unless action is taken.

We can see the impact of inadequate training in these vital areas in the number of those abandoning study. Only a quarter of those who took O-level physics went on to A-level work. Significantly, there was a disproportionately high female drop-out rate. Of those who passed A-level of all pupils, roughly one in seven went on to take a degree in either subject at a university. Just over 5 per cent. of graduates in maths and physics entered teacher training in 1986.

This winnowing process is at least partly due to the fact that unqualified and under-qualified teachers play so large a part in the process of instruction. Nonetheless, it remains disturbing that accurate figures on the number of teachers in both disciplines in service remain hard to come by. The Interim Advisory Committee on Teachers' Pay and Conditions found this to be a general problem in its recent report. There is some evidence that the wastage rates for maths and physics teachers has been rising, and this rate of loss must be of concern.

Even more serious is the apparent gap between the demand for teachers in maths and physics and the supply. Whatever assumptions are made, it is clear that there is a shortage now, possibly more than 2,000, and that there is the prospect of an even more serious shortfall developing by the mid-1990s.

Other countries have experienced similar problems. The teaching of maths and physics cannot be considered in a vacuum. The attraction of other professions, in status and pay, must be taken into account. If severe difficulties are to be avoided, I believe that a wider approach may be required.

The Manchester university report showed that in mathematics under 30 per cent. of graduates were women, yet women comprised more than 50 per cent. of those entering teaching. In physics the imbalance is even more striking. Given the interest in teaching among women graduates, action should be taken to increase the number of girls taking mathematics and physics in schools. I urge the Government to consider introducing a national career break scheme to encourage more women to enter teaching. I am informed that Kent local education authority has recently introduced such a scheme.

There appear to be discrepancies between the figures of the Department of Education and Science and those provided by other bodies which require urgent resolution. I hope that the Minister can help me on that. I urge him to consider the establishment of a comprehensive database for in-service teachers. That will show the extent of subject shortages, hidden and suppressed, throughout the country.

As a corollary, an analysis should be made of staff movements within the education system and out of it. We need to know how many teachers are moving into other posts, into administrative jobs, and how many are leaving to have children, to retire or for other reasons. Only then will it be possible to consider the shape and scale of the training programmes for new recruits and for former teachers hoping to re-enter the profession. It is, regrettably, clear that many graduates would prefer the larger salaries and better working conditions to be found in commerce and industry. It may be necessary to offer financial incentives to attract such people into the classroom.

I know that my hon. Friend understands those issues. I fully support the Government's intentions in establishing a national curriculum in which maths, science and technology will play a prominent role.

The measures that have been taken to provide bursaries for prospective maths and physics teachers studying for a postgraduate certificate of education have my full support. Could those bursaries be transferred to those who take up posts? I hope that the Minister will consider that suggestion in his reply. The provision of in-service training and the recruitment of new teachers through the Teaching As a Career unit are useful initiatives.

I welcome the Education Reform Bill, and many of its measures are relevant to this debate. In a recent paper that I wrote with my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright)—"A New Strategy for Education"—we would not only have secured the place of maths and physics in the curriculum, but would have created a professional teachers' council and a local pay bargaining mechanism at school level to help to restore the status of teachers. It is with individual teachers' sense of their professional standing, of their financial rewards and of their morale that an important part of the solution lies.

The CBI's response to the circular of the Department of Education and Science on this subject stated that the teaching profession needs to be made attractive, by giving status and appropriate conditions of service, which should include annual assessment, career development and chances of advancement. It acknowledges that teaching is a vocation and that, unless rewards are adequate in the market place, employers will up the ante by offering higher salaries elsewhere.

We should not rule out measures to obtain the short-term secondment of staff from industry or the recruitment of qualified teachers or technicians now working outside the profession on a long-term basis. I believe that technician support for science departments in schools is important and will help with the general problem. Time does not allow me to develop that theme, but I hope that my hon. Friend will bear it in mind.

Mathematics and physics are two of the key disciplines on which the modern industrial world rests. Britain cannot afford to be out-distanced by its competitors in passing on that body of knowledge to the next generation. The fact that the importance of the issue has been recognised inside and outside the House is encouraging. The Government have responded positively to the concerns of the teaching profession, the universities and the Engineering Council. I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to carry that process further in his reply.

1.19 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Robert Dunn): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) on a most thoughtful and constructive speech. Those of us who have known him for some time recognise that he always makes a major contribution to our debates, and his speech tonight was in that vein. I was equally pleased to hear the short intervention of the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson), who spoke about his connection with the Royal Society of Chemistry. We also recognise the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South-East (Mr. Lightbown), who always takes an interest in such matters and who had a long connection with the world of local government education.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North has introduced an important matter, and I give an undertaking that I shall pass on to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State the points that he and the hon. Member for Swansea, East made.

Britain has never been in greater need of people skilled in mathematics and the physical sciences so necessary to ensure that our industry can compete in the fast-changing world of the 1990s. We shall not have those people unless we have teachers to teach them, but it is precisely because those skills are in such high demand that those who have them are eagerly sought out by employers, against whom those who recruit people into teaching must compete.

We have long recognised that special attention must be paid to ensuring that there are enough maths and physics teachers to teach in our schools. That is why we have had a teacher shortage action programme in place for about two years, much of it built up on the basis of recommendations reaching us in response to a consultation document that we published on the issue two years ago. The result has been dramatic: since 1985 we have reversed the trend of decline in intakes to initial teacher training in the shortage subjects.

In 1986, as the report from which my hon. Friend quoted made clear, only 741 students started postgraduate certificate of education courses in maths and 341 in physics. In 1987, those two figures had risen by 29 per cent. and 41 per cent. respectively. It can be no coincidence that that took place over the first year of our action programme to combat teacher shortages, of which the main weapons are a bursary, tax-free, to trainee teachers in these subjects paid on top of their grant of £1,200 for 1986-87, which has risen to £1,300 in the next academic year, the use of national and local advertising, and the setting up of our Teaching As a Career unit—known as TASC—to promote teaching and improve its image.

All this had an effect on numbers last year, and is continuing to have an effect, even though applications for teacher training courses in maths and physics are not as buoyant this year as they were at the same time last year. But it is too early to say what the final recruitment figures are like, and I am still confident that the reversal of trend secured during the past two years will continue.

We are also spending six times more money than we are spending on direct recruitment on in-service training for the large number of teachers, also mentioned by my hon. Friend, who are teaching maths and physics without being properly qualified to do so. We call this the hidden shortage, and it is in many ways much more serious than the overt shortage of unfilled teaching posts in maths and physics, which are at their lowest level for many years. We intend to continue to offer substantial retraining and upgrading opportunities for under-qualified teachers through our training grants scheme to ensure that we have the right number of teachers that we need with the right qualifications to teach these vital subjects in the 1990s.

We have funded distance learning television-based and text-based in-service training materials in maths and science for use in upgrading the skills of those teachers who cannot be spared from the classroom.

Attracting new undergraduate recruits to teaching and upgrading existing teachers' skills is not, however, enough. The number of young people declines for demographic reasons in the 1990s just when the pupil population increases, so we need to make sure that we are tapping other sources of teachers to the full. We cannot expect teaching to take more than its fair share of scarce young qualified manpower.

That is why part of our action programme focuses on attracting older, experienced people into teaching from other careers. Surprisingly large numbers of people in industry and other walks of life often want to change to teaching. Their experience enriches the classroom. We are also encouraging local authorities to look at ways of maximising the use of another great undertapped pool of teaching talent—those who are qualified teachers but currently out of service. Many are, typically, married women who left the profession to have a family. Many are willing to return and local education authorities and schools may need to offer job-sharing opportunities and refresher courses to tempt them back.

All in all, we would maintain that we are already doing pretty well everything enjoined upon us by the recommendations of the report quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North. It is too early to say whether the coverage of our action programme, or its intensity, is inadequate. We are in any case doing rather more than the report suggests. The Teaching As a Career unit, for instance, has started to make a real impact with its catchy national advertising, well-produced literature and videos and continuous appearance on the undergraduate milk round, at careers fairs and at seminars and conferences all over the country, as well as counselling some of the very significant number of older people in other careers to whom I have referred who actually want to come into teaching.

Contrary to what the report alleges, over 80 per cent. of our first cohort of bursary holders were teaching in maintained schools last autumn, a higher proportion than most PGCE graduates. We are, as the House knows, making proposals to simplify routes to qualified teacher status, to make changing to teaching more attractive to suitable people with financial and other commitments that make it difficult for them to undertake full-time training with no commitment of a job at the end of it.

We shall go on doing all these things and we shall step up our activities if the reversal of the trend shows any signs of falling back into decline. In spite of the turmoil of the last few years and in spite of constant denigration of their own profession as a career by teachers themselves, people want to come into teaching. We believe that they will find teaching in the new world of the national curriculum and higher standards in our schools will be much more exciting, challenging and rewarding. We are convinced that this, together with the new pay structure, which also allows incentive allowances to be paid to teachers of shortage subjects, will encourage the teachers whom we need to stay in teaching. We are making more money available than ever to enable local education authorities to make improvements to the teaching environment.

I turn to the figures quoted by my hon. Friend. We all know that we can do anything with statistics. It is of course theoretically possible that we could be short of up to 12,000 maths teachers by 1995, as the report quoted by my hon. Friend maintains, but it is also theoretically possible for us to have more maths teachers than we need by the same date. It all depends on the assumptions that we put into the supply and demand bits of the equation. We think that those who wrote the report have missed out some key assumptions and have given an unnecessarily pessimistic weight to others.

We shall be in a better position to assess the demand for teachers in these subjects in the 1990s when we have digested the maths and science subject working group reports that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has just received. We shall have better estimates of the current supply of maths and physics teachers when we have the results later this year of the survey of secondary teachers that we have brought forward by a year. We shall then be in a position to assess what risk there is of a shortfall and its possible extent. We are well aware, as both hon. Members have said, that we must keep up the pressure. We believe that our programme of measures to combat teacher shortages has at least a good chance of reducing the shortfall to nothing. We certainly think that it should be given more of a chance to show whether it will.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North and to the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) for their contributions to the debate. We are fully aware of the problems and I believe that I have suggested some solutions to them.

Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SERVICES

Social Security Reform

1. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a further statement on the results of the implementation of the recent social security changes.

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. John Moore): The reforms have helped us to provide extra help for families with children, improve incentives to work, and make the system simpler and easier to understand. Reports from local offices in my Department indicate that the vast majority of cases were reassessed on time, and the new income support scheme is proving easier to administer. On the limited evidence available, the position in most local authorities appears to be similar. We have made it clear that we will continue to monitor the effects of the changes.

Mr. Michie: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for that reply. He mentioned the limited information available. I remind him of my prediction on 2 November 1987, at column 687, when I said that there would be hardship and asked for a report in 1988 on the effect of the legislation, bearing in mind that many of our constituents have lost out on housing benefit when they receive a fairly modest private pension. They have also lost out on certain Government training schemes. Therefore, will the Minister not carry out a limited survey, but come back to the House with the real results of the legislation?

Mr. Moore: As I said, we shall continue to monitor the situation carefully, but the Government reacted very quickly with the substantive changes that were announced on 27 April in areas that were causing clear hardship. The changes affect 8·5 million people, and overall they are settling in very successfully.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Does my right hon. Friend agree, and will he give publicity to the fact, that delays in paying family credit are not due to the local DHSS offices, which have to carry most of the flak from people waiting for family credit?

Mr. Moore: I am glad that my hon. Friend raised that point. The initial stages of the introduction of family credit meant that processing the claims took between five and six weeks on average. That has improved: 243,000 family credit claims are now in payment, 72,000 claims are pending, and the aim in future is to clear claims within 18 working days. My hon. Friend will be pleased to know that a help desk facility has now been made available for local offices to contact the family credit unit in North Fylde with regard to those who complain of financial hardship while awaiting an award of family credit. My hon. Friend has raised an important point, and I am delighted to be able to make that announcement.

Mr. Orme: Can the Secretary of State explain why people on industrial injury benefit and invalidity benefit have suffered so severely under these changes? Cuts of £10, £20 and £25 a week have been made in their benefits through loss in housing benefit. What is the reason for that, and what is the Secretary of State doing about it?

Mr. Moore: I draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the changes that were announced on 27 April, which took into account people above the income support level who had not had transitional protection. In most cases, the schemes to which the right hon. Gentleman is referring are discretionary ones implemented by local authorities. The changes have taken account of the points that the right hon. Gentleman has raised. Such people should be helped by the changes that were announced on 27 April.

Mr. Madel: In view of the time that it takes for people to receive family credit, does my right hon. Friend agree that local housing authorities should be patient and sensitive about rent arrears caused by an absence of family credit?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend has raised a constituency case with me, but he makes a good general point. Local authorities are required to take notional account of family credit. The five to six-week delay in processing at the start of the scheme has created some difficulties, but we have set up a central unit at North Fylde to assist local offices, and it should help considerably.

Mrs. Beckett: In his continued monitoring, will the Secretary of State take account of the fact that the rules, which allow only the offer of loans to the most desperate and destitute, simply add insult to injury? When his officers meet representatives of homeless organisations later this week, will he undertake urgently to review the balance between loans and grants?

Mr. Moore: No. We will look carefully, as we said we would, at the overall workings of the social fund. I hope that the detailed June figures will be available by the end of this week or the beginning of next week and placed in the Library, but it might be helpful for the hon. Lady and other Opposition Members to be reminded that loans generally are running at above 71 per cent. of the forecast profile and grants are running at about 32 per cent. In other words, the overall expenditure is about 59 per cent. of profile, which is nothing like the appalling suggestions that the Opposition made about the scheme. The overall figures are well within the cash forecast profile.

Mr. Cormack: Does my right hon. Friend nevertheless accept that there are still many cases of genuine hardship? Will he assure the House that the monitoring will be careful? Will he examine most thoroughly the dossier of cases that I am sending him today involving some of my constituents?

Mr. Moore: Of course. I shall look with pleasure at the cases.

Mr. Bill Michie: With pleasure!

Mr. Moore: I look with pleasure on the opportunity that I might have to help an hon. Member who, like Opposition Members, tries to help his constituents. I shall, of course, monitor the situation carefully. I remind the House, however, that 8·5 million people were affected by the most radical changes in social security for 40 years, and, overall, the changes have settled in extremly well.

Housing Benefit

2. Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the number of people likely to qualify for transitional protection payments in respect of housing benefits.

The Minister for Social Security and the Disabled (Mr. Nicholas Scott): We still estimate that over 300,000 households should qualify for the transitional payments announced by my right hon. Friend on 27 April following the changes in the housing benefit system.

Mr. Wilson: Does the Minister accept that when the Secretary of State told the House on 27 April that people most severely and significantly affected by the housing benefit cuts would benefit from the transitional arrangements, he was guilty of a very cruel con on some of the most vulnerable people in society? Will he confirm that many of the people who are most savagely hit by housing benefit cuts will not and were never meant to be helped by these transitional arrangements? How many people have so far applied for the transitional arrangements, bearing in mind the confusing under-publicity of the scheme? Will he confirm that the calculation made by his Department is that only 10 per cent. of those who apply will be successful? Will he answer these points——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We shall get through very few questions if we have long supplementaries.

Mr. Scott: I cannot answer the hon. Gentleman's third question, because I have no idea who will apply, but I can say that we have received 60,000 applications for transitional payments and that about 4,000 a day are coming in. We aim to have another advertising campaign in the near future to encourage the highest possible take-up of this protection, which, as we said at the time, is designed to limit housing benefit loss to £2·50 a week. It was never designed to protect people from rises in rents or rates which took place on 1 April.

Mr. McCrindle: The transitional arrangements notwithstanding, are there not many people who are ostensibly gainers under the new social security regulations who are being turned into losers almost entirely as a result of the necessary contribution of 20 per cent. to the local rates and the imposition of the water rate? I recognise the desirability of all citizens having some interest in local government expenditure, but does my hon. Friend remain satisfied that this is the most equitable way of achieving that?

Mr. Scott: Water rates were taken into account in the transitional protection. As for rates, £1·30 compensation for the minimum contribution to rates is built into the income support system. I believe that we tackled that problem in a fair and equitable manner.

Mr. Robin Cook: Will the Minister confirm that it is now 11 weeks since the scheme was announced and that, as yet, not a single claimant has received a refund? Many of them are now running up considerable arrears and facing threats of eviction by local authorities and private landlords. Do the Government not accept some of the responsibility for having got those people into that difficulty?

Will the Minister recognise that more than 5 million claimants have lost some or all of thier housing benefit, and well over 4,500,000 will get no help from the scheme —including all under 25, who have suffered a particularly savage cut in their benefit?

Finally, how long is transitional, and what is supposed to happen to claimaints when it comes to an end?

Mr. Scott: Those who have had the higher losses will have their transitional protection phased out over a number of years, so there is no question of the scheme being limited to a year. It is a remarkable acheivement that we have been able to set up the new office, employ and train the staff, establish the procedures and advertise all that so that I can say that the first payments will go out before the end of this week. We shall be anxious to achieve the highest possible take-up.

It is true that no transitional protection payments have been made under housing benefit, but they have been made for those in receipt of income support, who are the poorest people. Those who have not received benefit are by definitition not the poorest. Their payments should begin this week.

Social Security Reform

3. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what effect the social security reforms have had on the unemployment and poverty traps.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Michael Portillo): When family credit replaced family income supplement, about twice as many working families with children became eligible for help and the payments became more generous. Nearly all working families can now be better off in work. We ended the absurd situation in which a person on family income supplement whose pay went could be left worse off than before.

Mr. Riddick: That is an encouraging reply. Is not one of the major but little publicised advantages of the changes of last April the fact that it no longer pays to stay on the dole rather than to take a job? The Government are giving individuals the incentive to take a job. Does that not contrast starkly with the attitude of the Opposition, who clearly believe in blanket benefit and would prefer people to become more, rather than less, dependent on state handouts?

Mr. Portillo: My hon. Friend is right. There are now few families who would be better off out of work than in work. We ended the circumstances in which people could lose more benefit as their pay rose. Under family income supplement a family with three children who earned £75 could be £5·50 a week worse off if their pay rose to £130 a week.

Mr. Macdonald: Will the Minister say something about the impact of the loss of income support on self-employed Harris tweed weavers? He will know something about that, because I have written to the Department about it. He will know of the great fear among these people that the loss of income support will act as a disincentive to others to join the Harris tweed industry and become weavers. Will he concede that the industry is unique and requires special measures, and will he undertake to review the impact of the loss of income support upon it?

Mr. Portillo: I shall be happy to consider the hon. Gentleman's letters and reply to them in due course. There is now a clear division between income support, under which the claimant must work 24 hours a week or less, and family credit, under which the claimant will work 24 hours a week or more. That division has simplified the system and is generally advantageous.

Mr. Franks: Is my hon. Friend aware that the apprentices in the shipyards of Barrow, whose places were formerly funded under the youth training scheme, have been laid off as a result of the industrial dispute and are being denied income support or unemployment benefit of any kind? Will my hon. Friend look into that as a matter of urgency and issue local instructions that unemployment benefit is to be paid?

Mr. Portillo: I cannot do exactly what my hon. Friend wishes, because these are matters for an adjudication officer. If a person is involved in a trade dispute, he is not eligible for unemployment benefit or income support for himself, although payments can be made to his dependants. It is for the adjudication officer to decide whether a person is involved in a trade dispute. I hope that that decision will be reached as expeditiously as possible.

Hospitals (Land Sales)

4. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to increase the proportion of revenue from the sale of land belonging to hospitals which goes to district health authorities.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): The policy is as set out in the land transactions handbook and by circular. It states that a significant proportion of the proceeds of sale should remain with district health authorities as an incentive for those districts to rationalise and dispose of property. The hon. Gentleman may be aware that the total amount realised in England from land sales last year was nearly £190 million.

Mr. Hughes: Is the Minister aware that in the South East Thames region, the higher the sale price the more the region keeps? Therefore, there is an incentive, every time a hospital is sold, to go for the highest price, irrespective of what ends up on the site. Is she particularly aware that in my constituency, St. Olave's hospital in Rotherhithe is out for tender and there is a risk that a hospital set up to cater for the poor will have part of its land sold for housing for the rich, while many hundreds of thousands of poor, who need housing, health and community services, might be sold down the river by the policy of her Department?

Mrs. Currie: The health authority locally has a responsibility to make the best use of its property for health care. I understand that for the St. Olave's site there were proposals for a psychiatric day care centre, physiotherapy, a respite care centre, and so on. As for the way that the money might be used, the hon. Gentleman appears to have forgotten that £28 million is being allocated to the Guy's hospital phase 3 rebuilding. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be visiting that site on Friday.

Mr. Yeo: Is it not of the greatest importance in promoting health care that health bodies should use every available penny, whereas the concept that appears to be advanced by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and his party is that we should reduce the amount of money available for health care?

Mrs. Currie: My hon. Friend is right. He might have pointed out that the determined efforts that we have been making recently to dispose of sites has brought a lot more money to the Health Service. I have already said that £190 million was raised last year, and that compares with 10 years ago, when the total receipts on the sales of surplus property were £7 million.

Mr. Barron: Will the Minister look at the question in relation to proposals for the sale of land and hospitals, such as one in my constituency, which was owned by a charitable trust before being handed over to the NHS? When revenue is raised by such sales, should not a donation be made to the charity?

Mrs. Currie: I believe that that case was the subject of an Adjournment debate that I had with the hon. Gentleman not long ago. If I remember rightly, the charity that he had in mind had something to do with the mining industry. Those issues were settled a long time ago, back in 1948, when the hospitals were handed over to the Health Service. There is nothing more to be said.

Mr. Redwood: Is my hon. Friend aware of a scheme in Bromley, by a private company, to build a new 550-bed hospital, at practically no cash cost to the NHS, in return for land swaps? While not commenting on the merits of that particular case, will she welcome the principle of such a deal and confirm that the rules will not get in the way of it?

Mrs. Currie: The details of the rules are properly a matter for another of my right hon. Friends, but we welcome such deals and look forward to much closer co-operation between the NHS and the private sector, which will benefit everyone concerned.

Cleveland Child Abuse Inquiry

5. Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the cost of the Cleveland child abuse inquiry.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Tony Newton): The total cost to central Government of the inquiry into child abuse in Cleveland in 1987 is likely to be around £1·5 million. This includes payments of £300,000 each to the Cleveland county council and to the Northern regional health authority as a contribution towards the costs of those authorities.

Ms. Armstrong: The Minister's reply demonstrates that good quality work is not cheap, and meeting the demands of the inquiry and its report will also not be cheap. Many of the authorities are worried that they will not be able to put the necessary resources into protecting children. Can we look forward to a statement from the Government that they will adequately fund local authorities to ensure that every child who is on a child abuse register is properly supervised, so that we may know that the proper resources to meet this frightening problem will be made available?

Mr. Newton: In my statement last Wednesday I said that we were putting additional targeted resources towards training, which is an essential prerequisite. The hon. Lady's question distracts attention—again, I apologise for repeating something that I said last Wednesday—from the fact that, although the Cleveland crisis caused pressure on resources in Cleveland, it does not follow that a lack of resources created the crisis.

Mr. Holt: Does my right hon. Friend accept that when we talk of the Cleveland child sex abuse problem we make a mistake, and that it should be south Cleveland? There was no abnormality of numbers in north Cleveland. The abnormality was generated in the area where two stupid doctors used a discredited system to try to enhance their empires. There is absolutely no reason why the Government should put extra funding into that region for that purpose. The Cleveland child sex abuse problem occurred as a result of bad direction by the doctors and bad management by those charged with the responsibility of looking after the children.

Mr. Newton: I note my hon. Friend's remarks. I have no doubt that they will be taken into account by the Cleveland authorities when considering their response to the report.

Miss Lestor: Like many hon. Members last week, I am disappointed that the three-year training proposal will not be implemented. I recognise that some resources should go into the area of child abuse, but what steps has the Minister taken to include teachers in that training? It is clear to many people who have studied the Cleveland report, and child abuse generally, that there is a great deal to be gained from training teachers to identify children who are suffering and are at risk.

Mr. Newton: The grants that I announced last week were principally directed at social workers, but my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has issued a circular to the education service. I am conscious of the fact that there are training needs elsewhere, which I will discuss with my right hon. and hon. Friends.

Mr. Lord: Recent tragic events in my constituency have highlighted the fact that some small private children's homes still do not have to be registered or inspected regularly. Bearing in mind everyone's grave concern about the welfare of all our children, and especially those vulnerable children in care, will my right hon. Friend undertake to examine this matter with the greatest possible urgency, with a view to introducing the necessary legislation as quickly as possible?

Mr. Newton: Yes; I will consider that matter with a view to ascertaining the most appropriate action.

Mr. Tom Clarke: If it is not a lack of resources that is causing the problem in training, what is it? Why has the Minister not explained why he has not accepted the recommendation of the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work? Is there not a difference betwen £7 million and £40 million, and why should this be the only country in Europe to have a two-year training programme?

Mr. Newton: I have explained several times the importance of improving the training, among other things, of existing social workers in that area. I did not regard the CCETSW proposals as the best way to spend that money. We hope to make a number of important improvements in the training of existing as well as future social workers. The right course is a balanced package of that sort.

Nurses' Pay

6. Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what increases nurses working in paediatric intensive care in inner London can expect to receive as a result of the 1988 nurses' pay award.

Mr. Moore: The maximum pay for a staff nurse with post-basic training in paediatric intensive care in inner London is now £12,538, an increase of over £3,000, or more than 31 per cent., above the previous maximum annual salary.

Mr. Arbuthnot: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the fact that he recognises the problems of recruiting specialist skilled nurses in London is very welcome, as are the steps that he has taken? Is he further aware that the problem is one of recruitment, not only in inner London, but in outer London, and that the sooner we can achieve regional pay negotiations the better?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend will remember that the Government sought in their advice to the review bodies to move a little further on the question of geographical pay, but the review bodies did not see fit to go beyond the London area. Under the recommendations, the outer London area carries, in addition to London weighting, a 5 per cent. supplement.

Mr. Corbyn: Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that one of the problems for nurses in inner London is the high cost of housing? In determining their pay award, and in considering the sale of nurses' homes, will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that in future nurses can live reasonably near the hospitals at which they work?

Mr. Moore: There is no doubt that in inner London housing is an important factor in the employment of nurses. Last year the Government encouraged the Nationwide building society and other organisations to get together in some areas to assist in shared ownership. The hon. Gentleman may not be aware that over the past two years the total rental increase for nurses' accommodation has been 4 per cent. I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's point about nurses' accommodation. That is an important feature of the debate.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Is my right hon. Friend aware of suggestions for differential payments for nurses in paediatric branches and for sisters in other branches of the NHS, although they are thought to be doing equal work? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that nurses and sisters at all levels should be given equal pay for equal work under the 1988 award?

Mr. Moore: Of course nurses must be paid equal pay for equal work. The idea behind the review system was to give additional rewards to those with additional skills and responsibilities, especially those relating to patient care. There were clear shortages in those skills, and that is what the review regrading system is geared to address.

Private Nursing Homes

7. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy towards health authorities financing out of their budgets private nursing homes within the precincts of National Health Service hospitals.

Mrs. Currie: We welcome close collaboration between the NHS and the independent sector including, where appropriate, making premises available on NHS land. However, the hon. Gentleman should be aware that health authorities have no power to provide finance for private homes, though they can of course buy places on contract.

Mr. Wareing: Is the Minister not worried that ward 5 at Fazakerley hospital in Liverpool was closed recently, causing considerable distress to the elderly patients, and that a private nursing home for 85 people is being established, no doubt at a price? Is it not incongruous that National Health Service wards are closed but the private sector is allowed to get its profits out of nursing homes in the precincts of an NHS hospital?

Mrs. Currie: It sounds as though part of the proposal is a good idea. The hon. Gentleman may like to check with his constituents in Liverpool before he takes that line. The total number of council-provided homes for elderly people in Liverpool stands at 43, providing 1,600 places, and the total number of private homes in Liverpool stands at 66, providing 1,800 places. The private and voluntary sectors in Liverpool are already providing most of the care for old people.

Mr. Baldry: Will my hon. Friend confirm that once the Health and Medicines Bill is enacted it will be possible for district health authorities to enter into collaborative projects with private health providers and, if the authorities want, to provide private hospital accommodation in their own right?

Mrs. Currie: Depending on the exact terms of the contracts being negotiated, some of these projects are already legal. Work is proceeding on them. We welcome these projects.

Clinical Grading Review

8. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to ensure that the clinical grading review is based on actual jobs performed at the beginning of April and that managers will not be rewriting job descriptions.

Mr. Newton: The comprehensive management guidance which has been issued to health authorities makes it clear that, where this is possible, posts should be graded on the basis of existing duties and responsibilities.

Mr. Worthington: The Minister gave a commitment to fund the award fully, but there are disturbing stories that, because of the cash limits placed on health authorities, managers are trying to squeeze the award down to the money available. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that that would be a shortsighted policy, which could only cause problems in future years and lead to a sense of betrayal among nurses?

Mr. Newton: The Government have made the funds available to the health authorities to meet the costs of the award on the best available estimates. We have issued guidance to assist that process. I have every intention of ensuring that it is carried out in good faith.

Mr. Hayes: I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement and efforts on nurses' pay, but what fills many of us in the Conservative party with dread and foreboding is allowing regions to dole out the money to the districts, particularly regions such as North East Thames, which do not seem to have the management expertise to do so efficiently or properly.

Mr. Newton: I note my hon. Friend's views on the North East Thames regional health authority, which I share with him, but the sensible way to proceed is in the normal way that we seek to allocate funds in the Health Service.

Ms. Harman: Is it not now clear that the sum that the Government have set aside will not fund fully the nurses' pay award? The Government must give an unequivocal commitment to fund in full the results of the clinical grading review, otherwise managers will have to choose between downgrading nurses to meet the cash limits and cutting services to meet the pay award. Which is it to be?

Mr. Newton: I say simply that the hon. Lady is extremely unwise to venture such categorical assertions at such an early stage in this very large exercise.

Benefit Claimants (Resources)

9. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set up an investigation into the effects on the disposable resources of persons dependent on social security benefits of the April 1988 social security changes, and in particular the effect on those in receipt of industrial injuries pension, war pensions or disability pensions.

Mr. Portillo: We shall be monitoring the effects of the social security changes on all client groups—including the disabled.

Mr. Wigley: Does the Minister accept that the most traumatic of the changes in April were the increases in payable rents because of the erosion of housing benefit, and that of all the changes the most hurtful are those affecting the groups mentioned in my question—industrial injuries pensioners, war pensioners and disability pensioners? Even allowing for the transitional payments, they will find their special pensions reduced by perhaps £2 per week because of the way in which the benefit is working. Will the Government look again at the working people in those positions are not hit by that change?

Mr. Portillo: Let me separate those categories a little for the hon. Gentleman. He will know that for war pensioners the local authority discretion on housing benefit has not been removed. Any local authority that wishes to make special arrangements for war pensioners is free to do so. The other two categories are covered by the transitional payments, and any of the hon. Gentleman's constituents should now be applying to the transitional unit in Glasgow.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Is my hon. Friend satisfied with the distribution of explanatory leaflets for the benefit changes? Does he accept that two citizens advice bureaux in my constituency have drawn to my attention their concern about that? Can my hon. Friend do something to expedite the matter? I think that it would help.

Mr. Portillo: I am sorry to hear of my hon. Friend's concern. Some 8·5 million copies of leaflet RR4 on housing benefit have been published and most have been sent out. All social security offices, local authorities and many advice centres have them. If my hon. Friend has a particular difficulty in mind, I should be pleased to consider it.

Mr. Ashley: Can the Minister explain why charitable payments are now taken into account as income under the new income support scheme? Can he tell the House whether it is true that if a blind couple with guide dogs receive help in feeding their dogs, that couple could lose up to £10 a week under that scheme?

Mr. Portillo: The first £5 a week is disregarded. Other payments are taken into account as capital, as I understand it. The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that payments that are made to third parties are not taken into account. That provision could be helpful in the instance that he has mentioned.

Mr. Favell: It has not escaped my hon. Friend's notice that, for the Opposition, the alarmist flavour of the month is to suggest that more people are living in poverty. Will my hon. Friend tell the House whether the bottom 10 per cent. are better, or worse, off than they were six or seven years ago?

Mr. Portillo: Since 1981 that group has experienced an increase in living standards of about 8 per cent., which is better than for the population as a whole, but my hon. Friend draws attention to the fact that under the old statistics, which are based on supplementary benefit, if the rates of benefit became more generous, more people appeared to be living in poverty.

Social Security Reform

10. Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will meet the Disability Alliance to discuss the effects on people with disabilities of the social security changes which took effect on 11 April 1988.

Mr. Scott: We already have.

Mr. Flannery: I wonder whether Conservative Members are treating these questions seriously. The hon. Gentleman, amidst noise from the Government Benches, has given me a virtually monosyllabic answer. I have asked the Minister whether he really understands the misery and poverty that these changes in housing benefit and income support are causing. I want to ask him again and get a better answer. Does he not realise that there are severely disabled people in the community who at this moment are deeply worried about these changes? Will he tell the House exactly what he will do to satisfy these poor disabled people that these changes are not going to push them mercilessly into the sort of position into which the old and the sick are being pushed?

Mr. Scott: The hon. Gentleman could not have heard my answer. Let me give it to him again. We have already met the Disability Alliance. That was the question that the hon. Gentleman put to me.

Mr. Skinner: What about the money?

Mr. Scott: I will tell the hon. Gentleman about the money. In the period of this Government, £3 billion has gone to disabled people. There has been an increase of 80 per cent. in real terms. Then, as part of the reforms that we introduced at the beginning of April, an extra £60 million is going into the disability premium, another £8 million into the severe disability premium and another £5 million into the Independent Living Fund. We have fulfilled our commitments to disabled people.

Mr. Alfred Morris: How is the Minister replying to the Alliance's letter of 28 June, which shows that over 1 million disabled people were made worse off and expresses deep concern that these benefit changes came before the report on disability that the House is awaiting from the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys? Will he categorically confirm, or deny, The Independent's report of 23 June that the OPCS findings are already with the Government and that, by delaying its publication, the Government are deliberately trying to avoid parliamentary scrutiny and criticism and, by implication, acting in a way that is grossly contemptuous of this House?

Mr. Scott: Disabled people enjoy transitional protection at the point of change. The first report from the OPCS survey is likely to be published in September. There will be at least another three, and possibly another four, reports, the last of which I would expect to be published about 12 months from now. Until we have all those reports it would be premature to make any judgment about the extent and the nature of disability or the best way of meeting that need.

Medical Laboratory Staff

11. Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received about the pay and working conditions of medical laboratory scientific officers within the National Health Service.

Mr. Newton: A claim for improved pay and conditions of service was submitted on 5 April. Since then we have received numerous letters from hon. Members and individual medical laboratory scientific officers. Negotiations are continuing in the appropriate Whitley council.

Mr. Cook: The Minister will know that the Secretary of State has reason to be grateful to these laboratory technicians, in that his blood samples, when he was in a private clinic, were tested and quantified by these technicians in St. Thomas's hospital. So the critical position of these technicians is well known to the DHSS team. Will the Minister concede that what is necessary are pay and conditions that will not only retain the technicians that we already have but attract to the profession people of the necessary calibre to service the industry?

Mr. Newton: I am sure that almost every hon. Member, quite apart from my right hon. Friend, has had cause to be grateful to MLSOs at one time or another over the years. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the management side has put to the Whitley council a pay offer of 5·5 per cent., together with proposals for a restructuring, which would lead to a further increase in pay on assimilation to the new structure. Those proposals are designed precisely to meet the sort of problem to which the hon. Gentleman has referred.

Sir Anthony Grant: Is my right hon. Friend aware that these people, although far less glamorous than nurses, in many cases undertake work of greater responsibility than nurses, with life and death involved, and that, certainly so far as Adenbrookes in my constituency is concerned, they have had a raw deal and deserve better treatment?

Mr. Newton: I am not sure that I care to tread into the minefield of the precise comparison with nurses, but I certainly wish to pay tribute to the value of the work of MSLOs. The nature of some of that work has changed a good deal, hence the importance of the restructuring proposals.

Mr. Robin Cook: As the management and staff sides meet tomorrow, why does the Minister not take this convenient opportunity to say that he will fully fund the cost of regrading? If he will not do so, can he really expect the House to believe that regrading is the way to solve the problem of low pay when he knows that management is offering only 2·1 per cent. to cover its costs? How does he hope to meet the Government's targets on cervical screening when the laboratories that carry out the screening are losing trained staff at the rate of 15 to 20 per cent. a year?

Mr. Newton: The offers being made by the management have been made after proper assessment of the cost. I am confident that they can be met. I should like to take this opportunity to wish both sides well for successful negotiations tomorrow.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Boateng: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

The Prime Minister Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. I was present at Victoria station to mark the arrival of the President of Turkey. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I shall be attending a state banquet in honour of President Evren.

Mr. Boateng: The Prime Minister is clearly in need of some rest and relaxation. Will she be letting her hair down this year at the Notting Hill carnival? Before she does that, will she address herself to the deep-rooted problems of deprivation and discrimination that exist not only in Notting Hill but throughout our country? Will she do something about a situation in which apartments are for sale on our river at a cost of £370,000, with a Porsche thrown in, while in my local social security office in Harlesden, as a result of DHSS guidelines, the officers are paying out less than 2 per cent. of the total budget? [Interruption.] Will she confirm that the real cause of the moral thuggery about which the Home Secretary complains is in 10 Downing street itself?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask for brief questions, please.

The Prime Minister: No, I am not in need of rest and relaxation. The moment that the House rises I shall be going to Australia for the bicentennial celebrations. [Interruption.] I shall be there while the House is not sitting. The hon. Gentleman asked about social security payments. He will be well aware, particularly as I have heard some of the replies today, that the amount spent on social security has gone up enormously. The standard of living of the lowest groups has increased more than the rest.

Mr. Higgins: In view of the stand that my right hon. Friend has taken against terrorism, will she take time today to condemn the appalling attack yesterday on a Greek passenger vessel? While expressing sympathy to the victims, will she also pay tribute to the schoolchildren from the Sion school, Worthing, and those in charge of them, who not only reacted bravely but administered first aid to other people who had suffered?

The Prime Minister: I gladly respond to both parts of my right hon. Friend's question. This was an appalling act of terrorism against people on holiday. All acts of terrorism are appalling, but this was a particularly appalling one. The schoolchildren from Worthing were an enormous credit to themselves, their families, their school and to Britain in the way that they tackled the terrible events. I gladly pay tribute to them.

Mr. Hattersley rose——[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. These interruptions take up a lot of time.

Mr. Hattersley: On 23 June the Secretary of State for the Environment gave the House figures purporting to compare the burden of poll tax with that of the rates. Were those figures correct?

The Prime Minister: I would stand by what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said. I do not recall that matter, and I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would be surprised if I did.

Mr. Hattersley: If the Prime Minister genuinely stands by what the Secretary of State said, why has she endorsed a candidate in Kensington who denies her figures and says that the burden of poll tax in Kensington will be a third of the figure announced by the Secretary of State? Why are Ministers endorsing his fabrication every morning?

The Prime Minister: As I understand it, the candidate in Kensington—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister: For Kensington it has been said that the community charge would be—could be—£122 after the ILEA overspend—Labour's ILEA overspend—of £218 has been eliminated and after the money paid under the safety net has been eliminated. Those are two major figures. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would not wish the safety net to be abolished, as that would hit many Labour authorities very hard indeed. It means that some areas—in some Tory councils—have to pay higher rates while it obtains. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would not wish to be proud of the £218 ILEA overspend.

Mr. Hattersley: I do not think that the Prime Minister is wholly in command of her subject.[Interruption.] Does she realise that, in order to give even spurious justification to that calculation, she must be announcing to the House that she proposes a massive cut in education spending throughout the ILEA area? If the purpose of abolishing ILEA was to cut the cost of London education to the bone and to cut services with it, why did she not have the guts to tell the House at the time?

The Prime Minister: If the right hon. Gentleman were in command of his subject, he would realise that I had given him two very precise answers and even that the figures added up. The forecast of £122 is what the charge would be with no ILEA overspend of £218, which is to be laid at the door of a Socialist authority—the highest expenditure for some of the worst education in the country—and after the safety net, which is a burden deliberately placed on many Conservative authorities over a period of four years to help those in many Labour authorities. Does the right hon. Gentleman want that to be eliminated?

Mr. Thurnham: Does my right hon. Friend welcome the support given by Bury, Wigan and Rochdale councils to the employment training programme? Will she urge Bolton council not to turn its back on this excellent scheme to help the unemployed, and does she deplore the violent tactics used by some of the opponents of the scheme?

The Prime Minister: I hope that all authorities, including Bolton, will support the employment training scheme, and I welcome the support given by many local authorities. Those who do not support the scheme are depriving young people of very good training which will be very important in the coming decade because fewer young people will be leaving school and we shall need a greater proportion with the requisite skills. I hope that every authority will urgently support the scheme.

Q2. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cousins: Will the Prime Minister find time to meet representatives of the 500 advanced electronics workers at Marconi, Tyne and Wear, whose factory shut down yesterday, and the 5,000 shipyard workers whose jobs are at risk, to tell them face to face whether they, too, must get on their bikes to the bed-sits of south Kensington?

The Prime Minister: To the first part of the question, I am afraid that the answer is no. Redundancies are always a cause of great concern, especially in the areas where they occur, but, as the hon. Gentleman is aware, unemployment is falling in every region. He knows full well that there would be no effective industry if we did not keep up to date with the times and if we did not rationalise industry. That has to be done on many occasions. No electronics factory could exist without keeping up with the very latest developments, and that sometimes means redundancies. The hon. Gentleman referred to shipbuilding. I assume that he was talking about the problems of Swan Hunter, or the problems of Sunderland. I read what some Opposition Members said when the main frigate programme went to Yarrow, but let me state clearly that that programme went to Yarrow because Yarrow put in the best tender.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: When my right hon. Friend is discussing with her ministerial colleagues the question of Government hospitality, will she advise them to follow the example of the Leader of the Opposition in quaffing South African wine?

The Prime Minister: I think my hon. Friend makes the point more effectively than I could.

Q3. Mr. Fraser: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Fraser: Is the Prime Minister aware that in London there are many hundreds of children, including over 100 in my borough, who are officially recognised as being in danger of physical and sexual abuse but to whom, because of staff shortages, no social worker can be allocated? Is she aware that exploding house prices and the impending poll tax will only make matters worse? What will she do to assist these vulnerable children?

The Prime Minister: With all due respect to what the hon. Gentleman has said, I should have thought that that came very high on the list of priorities of any social worker and that any children who were vulnerable would be one of the first duties of the social workers who are there. [Interruption.] Otherwise, if the hon. Gentleman has any particular cases, will he please give the information to the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which has been doing excellent work for over a century or more?

Sir Jim Spicer: My right hon. Friend will know of the announcement last Saturday about the Saudi Arabian arms deal. She will also understand that my constituents who work at Westland greeted that announcement with delight and, if I may say so, some relief. Will she take an early opportunity to come to Westland so that they may thank her in person for the part that she played in achieving that order for this country?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Perhaps one day I will visit the firm. May I point out that I think we obtained the Saudi Arabian order because of the excellent way in which the Tornado order was fulfilled. That is due to all in the company, both management and work force, who carried out that order, as well as to the training given by the Ministry of Defence and the support services. It is a success story that won another powerful order, which we welcome.

Q4. Mr. Strang: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Strang: Is the Prime Minister aware of the anger in Scotland at the remark by the chairman of the British Steel Corporation last week to the effect that the Ravenscraig strip mill will probably close next year? Does she recognise that the strip mill is crucial to steel making at Ravenscraig and that Ravenscraig is fundamental to Scotland's future as an industrial nation? That is why any move to close it will be met by a campaign of popular resistance the like of which has not been seen before. Will she take the opportunity this afternoon to congratulate the Ravenscraig work force on achieving levels of productivity which are the highest of the five United Kingdom integrated plants and probably the highest in Europe? Will she affirm the Government's commitment to steelmaking at Ravenscraig?

The Prime Minister: I read very carefully the statement by my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Trade and Industry as long ago as 3 December 1987 on British Steel Corporation privatisation and the future of steel making at Ravenscraig. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is familiar with that statement, which made it clear that there will continue to be commercial requirement for steel making at Ravenscraig for at least the next seven years. My right hon. and learned Friend was tackled by Opposition Members straight away about the hot strip mill. He made the position clear:

> "There is a problem with hot strip mills, as I frankly disclosed in my statement. There is surplus capacity in the United Kingdom. However, the commercial judgment of the corporation is that it can continue to operate all four strip mills, at least until 1989."—[Official Report, 3 December 1987; Vol. 123, c. 1112.]

It was known from the beginning when the statement was made that there was considerable hot strip mill capacity in the corporation. That statement was made about the one associated with Ravenscraig as far back as 3 December 1987.

Q5. Mr. Gregory: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Gregory: Will my right hon. Friend accept the House's gratitude for taking on board six refurbishment areas of rundown inner cities held by Labour authorities? Does she agree that it is a national scandal that today more than 136 council dwellings, largely in the hands of Socialist bureaucracies, lie vacant? Will she tackle that matter at the earliest possible opportunity?

The Prime Minister: I saw the welcome that my right hon. Friend's statement on action housing trusts received in the House yesterday. The people living in those areas will greatly welcome the increased expenditure on their housing and the higher standard of living and greater security that they will enjoy. My hon. Friend is absolutely right in saying that many council houses are left vacant for far too long. They number about 110,000 properties. The complaints about homelessness made by many of the authorities concerned would be far more credible if they were to fill some of the accommodation that they have left empty.

Mr. Maclennan: As the Sharpeville Six's stay of execution is running out, will the Prime Minister make the strongest representations to the South African President that it would hinder the dialogue between South Africa and our country, and with all democratic and justice-loving countries, if those executions were to proceed?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, representations have already been made to President Botha——

Mr. Winnick: By the right hon. Lady?

The Prime Minister: By me, through the usual channels and through the best channels, for clemency towards the Sharpeville Six. If their death sentences are confirmed, those representations will be made again. They will not be made only by me, but will be reinforced by the Toronto summit Seven and the Community Twelve.

House of Commons Library

3.31 pm

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As you are the guardian of Back-Bench rights, I am sure that you would want Back Benchers to be well informed, and our Library services are essential in that regard. You may not be aware that the latest volume of Winston Churchill's biography is missing from the Library. That is very unfortunate, because if it were there hon. Members could read on page 190 that when Churchill was in Cuba on 1 February 1946 and was asked to criticise the Attlee Government, he replied that he never criticised the Government of his country while he was abroad.

Mr. Speaker: I shall look into the loss of the book.

Ravenscraig Steelworks

3.32 pm

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, arising out of the Prime Minister's answer about the Ravenscraig Steelworks.

Mr. Speaker: Order. A point of order must be for me and cannot arise from a question to the Prime Minister.

Dr. Reid: A few days ago the chairman of the British Steel Corporation made a statement that he had advised the Government about the probable closure of the Ravenscraig hot strip mill. Is it in order to raise at this point the fact that the answer given by the Prime Minister today suggests——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not in order to raise it, because that would be an extension of Prime Minister's Question Time. It is not a matter for me. It is an Opposition Day, and a great many Opposition Members wish to speak.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In order to clarify the matter, and to ensure that we know exactly what is the situation in respect of Ravenscraig, will you, in your capacity as Speaker, tell the House whether you have received a request from any Minister for permission to inform the House of the up-to-date situation? If no such request has been made, will you convey to the Government our request that a statement be made to clear up the matter?

Mr. Speaker: That is not a point of order. I have received no request for a statement. The hon. Gentleman has made his point.

BILL PRESENTED

Young Employees (Training Requirement) Bill

Mr. Barry Sheerman, supported by Mr. Eric Martlew, Mr. Michael Meacher, Mr. Andrew F. Bennett, Mr. Gavin Strang, Ms. Clare Short, Mr. Ken Eastham, Mr. Ron Davies, Ms. Hilary Armstrong, Mr. Dennis Turner, Mr. David Hinchliffe and Mr. Gerry Steinberg, presented a Bill to require employers to provide training for all employees aged between 16 and 19 years of a standard at least equal to that provided under the Youth Training Scheme: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed [Bill 196].

Ravenscraig Steelworks

3.35 pm

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I have not had the opportunity to give you notice of my intention to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20, but the action that provokes me into doing so has taken place only in the last few minutes, and I take the view that Standing Order No. 20 should be flexible enough to take account of anything that happens before the time at which the Adjournment is moved. Therefore, I beg leave to move the Adjournment——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but I do not believe that anything new has taken place since 12 o'clock today. I listened carefully to the Prime Minister's reply, and, as I understood it, she was reading out what had been stated previously. I cannot hear a Standing Order No. 20 application arising out of that question.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can you give us some guidance? There is more to a statement than the mere words read from a bit of paper, and Opposition Members feel that what we heard from the Prime Minister about Ravenscraig is of extreme urgency and importance to many hon. Members and many people in Scotland. We must have an opportunity to debate the matter.

Mr. Speaker: There are opportunities to debate the matter. There are Opposition days, Adjournment debates and Questions.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will hear the hon. Members as long as they realise that they are putting in jeopardy—[Interruption.] Order. I am on my feet. —the equal claims of their colleagues, many of whom wish to take part in two very important Opposition day debates.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt if I can give an answer to the hon. Gentleman, but I will take his point of order.

Mr. Strang: I shall be very brief, Mr. Speaker. The point that must be grasped is that the statement read out by the Prime Minister gives the impression that the remark by the chairman of British Steel was not, as was widely reported, some sort of gaffe. Having given that statement credence, we consider it fundamentally important for us to hear a statement from an Industry Minister to clear the matter up. Can you help the House and ask the Leader of the House to call an Industry Minister to appear before us?

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it necessary for us to be so solicitous to these points of order, bearing in mind that Opposition Members are absorbing their own speaking time because, as usual, they have not enough speakers to support their business?

Mr. Speaker: I think that the whole House appreciates —I certainly do—that this is an important matter for hon. Members who represent constituents who work at Ravenscraig. I cannot help the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang), but I am sure that what has been said has been heard and noted on the Front Bench.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. If I hear the hon. Gentleman, I shall have to take it into account very carefully later.

Dr. Reid: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker. I assure you that I do not wish to put in jeopardy the chances of other hon. Members to make a contribution, but it must be understood that 20,000 Scottish jobs appear to have been put in jeopardy today. I should like to submit an application under Standing Order No. 20. I shall explain to you, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot hear such an application, for the reasons that I have already given.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Ordered,

That the Value Added Tax (Special Provisions) (Amendment) Order 1988 (S.I., 1988, No. 1124) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Lightbown.]

Smoke Nuisance (Domestic Sources)

3.38 pm

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (Norfolk, South-West): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to enable smoke emitted from a chimney of a private dwelling to be deemed for the purposes of Part III of the Public Health Act to be a statutory nuisance.

Let me make it clear at the outset that it is not my intention in bringing in the Bill to try to transform all areas of this land into clean air zones or to impose bureaucratic controls on the types of fuel or appliances used. The Bill's intention is merely to remove an anomaly in existing public health legislation and to enable local authorities to act in cases in which gross smoke nuisance occurs from domestic chimneys. It is indeed an anomaly that, under our present law, smoke may be a statutory nuisance except when it is emitted from the chimney of a private dwelling.

Since, in all urban and suburban areas in Britain, clean air legislation is in force limiting the types of fuel that may be used, smoke nuisance from domestic fires is largely a rural problem, where the clean air legislation is not in force. In such areas, therefore, people have no statutory protection from neighbours who cause a gross nuisance, either because of what they choose to burn on their fires —I am talking not about logs, but about motor tyres, animal carcases or old window frames—or because of faulty chimneys or flues. Such people have recourse to the law through a civil action, but they cannot always afford that.

The fact that the omission is an anomaly was recognised by the Government who, in a consultative document on air pollution control, issued in December 1986, said that it was their intention to repeal section 16(1)(a) of the Clean Air Act 1956 so as to bring non-dark smoke emissions from dwellings within the ambit of the statutory nuisance provisions of the Public Health Acts. Such a proposal is strongly supported by the Institution of Environmental Health Officers, the members of which have to deal with the problem. It states:

"It was of concern to the Institution that the proposals in the consultation paper did not culminate in new consolidating and revising air pollution proposals which would have included the provisions for the control of nuisance."

No doubt hon. Members will be able to quote examples from their own constituencies. A couple of examples from south-west Norfolk serve to illustrate the effect on individuals of the anomaly that exists. Mrs. Hammond's cottage is semi-detached. Unfortunately for her, her neighbours are enthusiastic users of a solid fuel range, which is refuelled several times a day and then burnt with the damper shut down. She says:

"The smoke billows continuously and at times so thickly that we cannot see from one end of the garden to the other . . . We cannot go outside to work in the garden or on the cottage, nor can I hang out laundry . . .On winter evenings my neighbours light the open fire also and we get a double dose. My nine-year-old son's doctor believes that his constant cough is caused by the smoke and he has had to go to hospital for chest X-rays in the past several months. Our neighbours admit that their flue should be 18 inches higher than it is now to prevent turbulence and down draughts, but they will not pay a builder to install a new flue. The environmental health officer said that he has no powers to do anything about the pollution and we are very reluctant to go to court ourselves . . . Do we have to wear a face mask every time we go outside?"

Mrs. Thompson lives in a semi-detached house with a flat roof single-storey extension on the rear—an exact replica of her neighbour's house. Unfortunately for her, the neighbour installed an oil boiler attached to an old flue in what had been the old washhouse. It goes without saying that that was done without building regulation permission. Because the flue is not tall enough to provide draught for the boiler, the fumes roll along the roof and into a first floor window in Mrs. Thompson's house. No action can be taken by the local authority, and no action can be taken under the building regulations.

In each of those cases the nuisance was investigated by the environmental health officer and was found to be genuine, but all action had to be abandoned because the council had no powers to act. Theoretically, it would be possible for such local authorities in rural areas to declare clean air zones to deal with the problem of smoke from domestic chimneys. However, that would be too draconian a solution to deal with isolated instances of nuisance, and it would be unnecessarily repressive for the majority of people, who are law-abiding and considerate neighbours.

What are needed are powers for local authorities to investigate and deal with nuisance caused by domestic smoke in the same way as they can deal with other domestic nuisance. After all, it has been recognised since the end of the previous century that no emission of smoke can be tolerated if it constitutes a recognised health hazard, either short-term or long-term, but that does not apply to smoke from domestic sources. That omission was put right for people living in towns with the clean air legislation in 1956. My Bill seeks, in a less draconian fashion, to offer the same protection from isolated incidences of gross domestic smoke nuisance for people in rural areas. It is a limited measure, designed to deal with a problem which, although it may occur relatively rarely, nevertheless constitutes a gross nuisance and a health hazard. Therefore, I hope that the Bill will be supported.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mrs. Gillian Shephard, Miss Ann Widdecombe, Mr. Malcolm Moss, Mr. Alan Amos, Mr. Roger Knapman, Mr. John Greenway, Mr. David Martin, Mr. Andrew Mitchell, Mr. Simon Burns, Mr. Julian Brazier, Mr. David Davis and Mr. Tim Boswell.

SMOKE NUISANCE (DOMESTIC SOURCES)

Mrs. Gillian Shephard accordingly presented a Bill to enable smoke emitted from a chimney of a private dwelling to be deemed for the purposes of Part III of the Public Health Act to be a statutory nuisance: And the same was read a First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 22 July, and to be printed. [Bill 197.]

Opposition Day

[18TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Inequalities in London

3.45 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I beg to move,

That this House condemns the growing division between rich and poor in London; deplores the damaging effects of poverty on the health and welfare of the worst-off Londoners, which is reducing their chances of decent homes, worthwhile jobs, sound education and satisfying leisure; recognises that this will be made much worse by the Government's poll tax, Housing, Education and Finance Bills; notes the contrasting luxury of the rich who have benefited so much from this Government's policies; and calls for new policies to secure for all Londoners the benefits enjoyed under this Government by the privileged few.

Mr. Speaker: I must announce to the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Dobson: It would be difficult for anyone in possession of his senses to deny that our capital city at the moment presents a sharp contrast between those who are doing well and those who are not. On the one hand we see people who are affluent and arrogant revelling in a display of wealth both tasteless and joyless, while on the other we see people degraded and demoralised, with no jobs, no homes and no hope. All that would be bad enough if it were the accidental by-product of circumstances beyond human control, but it is not. It is the direct product of Government action and Government inaction.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (Derbyshire, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You informed us that a number of hon. Members wished to take part in the debate. As only two hon. Members representing London constituencies are present, would it be in order to adjourn the debate for a short time so that more hon. Members can come into the Chamber to participate in the debate?

Mr. Speaker: That is not a point of order for me. Mr. Dobson.

Mr. Dobson: It seems to me that it is a gross abuse of the House for a Tory Whip to go to the Back Benches and ask his hon. Friend to raise a false point of order.

Nowhere is the contrast between rich and poor greater than that between those who have a pleasant home of their own and those who have no homes of their own and are forced to share with parents or in-laws or dwell in squalor. No fewer than 15,000 families in London are officially homeless. About half those families live in bed-and-breakfast hotels. For most of them, their lives are like hell on earth.

Conservative Members need not take my word for it. A recent report by the British Medical Association stated:

"Even if hotel accommodation is in good order, it is rarely appropriate to the needs of young children. It is difficult to maintain hygiene while washing, eating and sleeping in one overcrowded room. High levels of gastroenteritis, skin disorders and chest infections have been reported . . . The stress . . . undermines parents' relationships with each other and their children. Normal child development is impaired through lack of space for safe play and exploration. High rates of accidents to children have been reported."

That is not a report on the Third world. The people described are our fellow citizens living today within two or three miles of the House, and we should all be ashamed of ourselves.

Thousands more of our fellow citizens in London are living in overcrowded homes. Thousands of young people with children are sharing with their parents or in-laws. The Government have put the clock back. Once again many poorer families are living with three or four generations in one crowded house or flat. To put that right, the Government will have to spend more money on housing.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: No. It is essential that we get on, and I do not think that my giving way will help.

Mr. Maples rose——

Mr. Dobson: Mr. Speaker asked us to keep our speeches to a minimum so that everybody could have an opportunity to speak, and I shall stick to that request.

With all the recent preaching that we have heard from the Prime Minister about the need for Christian virtues, we might have hoped that the precepts of the New Testament would illuminate the Government's housing policy, but I suppose that we can hardly expect the Prime Minister to practise what she preaches. Nevertheless, it was the Prime Minister who, in 1980, shocked the Sunday audience of "Weekend World" with the statement:

"Nobody would have remembered the Good Samaritan if he'd only had good intentions. He had money too".

The recent Budget showed that the Government have the money but lack the good intentions. At least the Levite and the priest confined themselves to passing by on the other side. The Government are actually making matters worse. The only characters in the parable of the good Samaritan whom the Government resemble are the thieves who mugged the poor traveller in the first place.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: No, I shall not give way—that would not help at all.

The housing crisis did not happen by accident. Much of it is a direct result of Government policies. In 1979 councils and housing associations in London started to build nearly 11,000 homes.

Mr. Gow rose——

Mr. Dobson: By 1986 that figure had dropped to 3,000. No wonder homes to rent are hard to come by.

Mr. Gow rose——

Mr. Dobson: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, but it is the only time that I shall give way to a Conservative Member.

Mr. Gow: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Does he agree that, although the good Samaritan did indeed have a kind heart, what was of more practical significance was the fact that he had two pence in his pocket? Was not my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister therefore making a quite legitimate point?

Mr. Dobson: If the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), who is of course entitled to intervene in this debate about London, had listened to what I had said, he would know that the Prime Minister said:

"Nobody would have remembered the Good Samaritan if he'd only had good intentions."

People remember the good Samaritan because Jesus Christ preached a parable about him. It is not a question whether he had money or good intentions—the story appears in the Bible because somebody preached the parable. To suggest, as the Prime Minister did, and as the hon. Member for Eastbourne does, that that parable would not have been remembered if there had not been money around is preposterous. We can assume that the Levite and the priest had money, and that they passed by on the other side, and that what were missing were good intentions. That is precisely what the Government are lacking.

Mr. Maples: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: No.

Subsidies have been cut and rents have soared. As now, the highest council rents in London in 1979 were charged by Kensington and Chelsea borough council. In 1979, its average rent was £13 a week. It is now £33 a week, but that is nothing on the private sector, where rents of £300 a week have been sought for three-bedroom flats. One-bedroom flats can command more than £100 a week, and £115 a week was recently registered as a fair rent for a three-bedroom maisonette.

Rents have risen, but house prices have soared. In some parts of central London very ordinary flats go for as much as £250,000, and one-bedroom flats go for £100,000. Most people on average incomes in London have been priced out of the house buying market. How many nurses, bus drivers or teachers can afford the current prices? By contrast, some of those who have benefited most from the Budget are doing very well and their extra wealth contributes to the house price spiral which does so much damage to people who are less well off than they are.

Conservative Members need not take my word for that, either. Last week, from a profession to which the Conservative party appears to be entirely devoted—the estate agents—came a letter through the letter boxes of Kensington. It said that one single factor had contributed most to the buoyancy of the recent London property market, and that was the Budget. It went on to say:

"The lowering of the top rates of tax has resulted in a large increase in the disposable income of those who command salaries between £40,000 a year and £50,000 per annum . . . In consequence the considerable demand for quality flats and houses is in part fuelled by many people who are seeking to trade up. The demand for quality family houses with gardens in all price ranges is especially high."

What a record combination the Government have put together for housing Londoners: record low house building, record high rents and record high prices, combined with record levels of homelessness and of overcrowding, in modern times.

The Housing Bill will make matters worse. In the time available I shall not repeat the arguments put so forcefully over the months by my hon. Friends—especially by my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), who has done such sterling work. I shall merely remind the House of what happened the last time the Tories put their faith in private landlords. Kensington contributed a new word to the English language, for it was in Notting Hill, following previous Tory attempts to bring market forces back into housing, that the crooked landlord Rachman used harassment and physical violence against his tenants to such effect that the whole squalid process was named after him. Between them, the new Housing and Finance Bills will not only conjure Rachman's spirit from the grave, but will give it a tax incentive to come out and haunt us again.

In many parts of London today we see much building work on areas of derelict land. In a decently ordered society, the priority for that land would be the needs of the local communities that surround it. What are the priorities for the development of such land, whether in docklands or behind King's Cross station in my constituency? Are they to be homes for local people, parks and playgrounds for their children, hospitals and clinics or jobs that local people will be able to take up? Not likely. Under the new dispensation the local community comes last.

The main use for property now is property speculation, which has caused a fivefold increase in land prices in London. The property speculators now decide what gets built, and if anyone objects the Government back the speculators. Not for them any finely balanced judgments of local housing versus a local park or local industry. The first priority is profits for the speculators, which rise in direct proportion to the damage that they do to the rest of society.

If any Conservative Members challenge my views on this I recommend that they read what Winston Churchill said about property speculators in 1909——

Mr. Maples rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The hon. Gentleman has made it clear that he is not giving way.

Mr. Dobson: Who are these speculators? Are they especially well equipped to take the decisions on what should be built where in our capital city? I have always believed that many of them are crooks, but apparently the Government have great faith in them. On 7 March this year the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and the Minister responsible for inner cities told a press conference:

"Business men in the past . . . provided the leadership that made their cities great . . . It can be done again . . . Our business men today have the resources, the expertise and . . . the commitment to help the Government to make lasting changes in our Inner Cities."

I wonder whether that golden vision of civic leadership was what inspired the Brink's-Mat bullion thieves to invest their loot in docklands. I know that Proudhon said that property is theft, but this is ridiculous. Surely Ministers do not expect us to believe that these rich thieves took courses in urban design before putting their money into Cyclops wharf. Instead of undeveloped land being used to help the whole community, it is being exploited to benefit a few rich property sharks and their friends in the Tory party.

If the housing and planning system is penalising the poor and benefiting the best off, what is happening to education, for education is one way in which a whole society, or a few individuals, can improve their prosperity and prospects? Here again the Government are hammering the schools used by most London children and at the same time increasing public subsidies to private schools. Worst of all, many caring education authorities are being forced to reduce their efforts to help the poorest children most. Units for children with special learning difficulties have had their staffs reduced. Grants to help poorer children stay on at school are being cut or are under threat, and it is the same with clothing grants and grants for school trips.

School meals were described by The Lancet as the "sheet anchor" of child nutrition. When the Government came to power, about half of London's schoolchildren could afford to buy a school meal. Tory education authorities, encouraged by the Government, raised prices of meals from 25p to as much as 75p and as a result, by last autumn, only one third of London's children could afford to buy a school meal. To its everlasting credit, the Inner London education authority—whatever the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) may say about it—and the Labour outer London boroughs struggled to keep their prices down. They also used their discretion to give wide entitlement to free school meals, but the social security changes have put an end to that.

From April this year, at least 34,000 children in London have lost their entitlement to free school meals. Two thirds of those children got nothing in place of their free meal, while the parents of the rest got anything between 66p and 38p a week instead of a free school meal. In contrast, schools for the well-off are receiving more and more subsidies—for example, through the assisted places scheme. Recently we have even had to endure the graceless spectacle of some of these academies for the grasping qualifying to receive cheap food from the Euro-surpluses.

On top of that, the Education Reform Bill, by abolishing ILEA, will impose further years of turmoil on London's schools and children. Teachers, who should be concentrating on the job of teaching, will be distracted by wondering whether they will have a job at all. At the same time, the Government will insist that less and less is spent on the schooling of London's children. All those decisions are being taken by Ministers who spend more and more on the private education of their own children.

When it comes to health care, the contrast between rich and poor grows more stark in London every day. When the Government came to power, the number of NHS beds in London was 64,000 and the hospital waiting lists—far too high—totalled 104,000. The number of beds has been cut to 52,000, but the number of Londoners waiting for operations has soared to 133,000. Those figures are not arid statistics: they are lists of human beings suffering pain and misery.

While the Government cuts have reduced the number of beds in the NHS, Government encouragement and subsidies from the taxpayer have expanded the number of beds in private hospitals in London from 1,900 to 3,200. That is all very well for those who can pay, but it is no help to those who cannot. The cost of private health insurance is way beyond the reach of the less well-off. The extra private hospital beds in London have actually extended NHS waiting lists, because most of the work at the private hospitals is done by doctors moonlighting from the NHS.

By the Government's calculations, the 10 most deprived local authority areas in England are all in London. Needless to say, Government support to help local councils to maintain and improve services to local people has been reduced. More reductions are promised.

Whilst average incomes have continued to increase, the gap between the poorest and the more affluent has widened. The difference is most marked in London, where real incomes of the poorest households have gone down by 17 per cent. and real incomes of the highest households have increased by 18 per cent.

The social security changes did not just deprive 34,000 London children of a free school meal. They took money from tens of thousands on housing benefit and hammered the worst-off most of all. Families who used to get single payments to help them over a crisis no longer qualify. A family, after a year in bed and breakfast, still needs help to get a few sticks of furniture together, but now such families are not entitled to a grant. They have to go cap in hand to apply for a discretionary grant from the social fund. This was introduced to cut the money available to help such people.

The Ministers concerned must be proud of their handiwork. "Didn't they do well?" Grants under the social fund in London in May this year total just 6 per cent. of the average monthly grants made before the system was changed—a mean 94 per cent. cut in grants for those in desperate need. Meanwhile, the Budget poured millions into the pockets of the rich and the Finance Bill is strewn with more tax loopholes for them to exploit, including extending the business enterprise scheme to promote Rachmanite landlords.

In the end, Londoners do not want welfare. They want to be able to fend for themselves. Above all they want jobs, well paid and decent jobs. When the Government came to power, 136,000 Londoners were out of work. The London total in the prosperous south-east now stands at 311,000. Despite the massive increases in schemes of one sort or another, that includes 91,000 young Londoners who are starting their would-be working life without the money and self-respect that go with a job.

What of the people in work? Some salaries in the City are ludicrous and indefensible, with people getting paid more in a week than a qualified nurse gets for a whole year. It costs a lot of money to live in central London. Again, Tory Members need not take my word for it. They can take the word of a former Cabinet member, Lord Gowrie, who resigned from the Government because £33,000 a year was not enough for him to live on in central London. Is that is so, and he has not resigned from the Tory party, how do he and his friends expect one of the firefighters who did their gallant duty at King's Cross to get by in central London on £13,000 a year?

Many people in central London now rely on casual and part-time work—work that usually means insecurity, poor pay and bad working conditions. Contrast that with the situation in the City, where gilded youths flit from job to job with golden handshakes both when they start and when they finish.

Mr. Terry Lewis (Worsley): Did the hon. Gentleman say gelded?

Mr. Dobson: Perhaps they should be gelded, and we would have fewer of them in future.

On top of all that, Londoners face the poll tax. The poll tax is a deliberate attempt by the better-off to transfer the burden of local taxation on to the shoulders of people worse off than themselves. It is an effort by the well-off to abandon their obligations to their fellow citizens. It is bound to add to the growing divisions between rich and poor in London and throughout the whole of Britain.

What sort of society have the Government helped to create in London? It is a society in which old people are afraid to go out at night, drug addiction is at record levels, racial attacks fill fellow citizens with fear, violence and vandalism are commonplace, and the streets are filthy.

[Mr. Dobson]

The Tory creed of greed worsens old wrongs. Their worship of selfishness mocks those who feel some responsibility for their fellow citizens. It stifles the generous instincts of ordinary Londoners, but it cannot stamp out concern for family, friends, neighbours and whole communities. All over London those concerns are growing. The Government will not be able to ignore them much longer. If they were to ignore them, it would be not so much at their peril, but at our peril, because as Abraham Lincoln said:

"A house divided against itself cannot stand."

Our capital city is now socially the most divided in Europe. We wish to unite it and give everyone a common faith in our city, but we will never achieve it while we have this Government.

4.9 pm

The Minister for Social Security and the Disabled (Mr. Nicholas Scott): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the question and to add instead thereof:

'congratulates the Government on those economic and social policies which have created conditions in London in which real incomes are rising; notes, with particular satisfaction, that between 1981 and 1985 the real incomes of the poorest rose faster than average; endorses the Government's policies to alleviate inner city deprivation in London through the programmes set out in Action for Cities, including economic regeneration through the encouragement of enterprise, employment and training, improved housing, through such programmes as estate action, the establishment of Housing Action Trusts and the extension of the role of housing associations, education and revitalising the urban environment.'.

I take part in this debate, as does the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), as someone representing a London constituency. I am a Londoner, having been born, educated and earned my living in the centre of London. I did not recognise the hon. Gentleman's description of London. I did not recognise it, because it does not exist—it is a fantasy.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Scott: I will give way in a moment, but not just yet—and probably not to that hon. Gentleman. That London does not exist except in the fantasies of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Come down to the Embankment tonight.

Mr. Scott: I know about the Embankment; I have been more concerned about the homeless and down-and-outs in London than the hon. Gentleman has during his political career. I have played my part in trying to alleviate their plight. I shall have a word or two to say about the homeless and where the blame for homelessness in London should lie. I advise the hon. Gentleman to hold his horses for a moment.

I have considerable admiration for the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras. His contributions are refreshingly frank. On television recently—perhaps he will correct me if I have his words wrong—someone suggested to him that the Labour party had lost the general election because of a muddle over defence policy, and he said, "No, we lost it because no one believed that we could run a whelk stall." It is 12 months since the Labour party lost that election, and I wonder how much its position has improved in the intervening 12 months.

I was disappointed that we had an ideological tirade from the hon. Gentleman. He should go out and look at London today and see whether private landlordism or public landlordism has contributed more to the squalor of our capital city, and decide where the right lies.

I recognise that the probable reason for this debate today is the by-election in Kensington the day after tomorrow. I look forward with some relish to the result on Thursday night, and perhaps some of the contributions will help to ensure that the Tory candidate wins that by-election. It is interesting that in the first by-election in this Parliament—in a Tory "marginal" seat, with a majority of about 4,500—the Leader of the Opposition swans off abroad, leaving behind the smiling predator for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone). I would not leave the country with the hon. Member for Brent, East hanging around Parliament.

The Leader of the Opposition deserves the Milton Obote prize for overweening self-confidence. But perhaps he was accurately predicting the result of the by-election on Thursday and, as he would not want to comment on it, he thought he should be several thousand miles away.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): As the Minister has mentioned the Kensington by-election, will he tell the House and the electors of Kensington whether he and the Conservative candidate—but specifically the Minister—support the closure of the four hospitals in west London that serve that area as well as others?

Mr. Scott: I am a Minister in the Department of Health and Social Security, and eventually the decision on the restructuring of the hospitals in that part of London will have to come to the DHSS for ministerial decision. It would not be proper for me to judge that in advance of the decision that my Secretary of State will have to make in due course.

The Labour party's approach to this election was well heralded in the title of its motion, "Inequalities in London"—the Labour party's old obsession with equality rather than the quality of life. It is interested not in maximising human life chances and increasing people's choices about their lives, but rather in the drive for equality at all costs, despite the lessons that it should have learnt from its past about the direction in which that policy——

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): If the Minister is concerned about equality, can he justify, and say whether he agrees with, the fact that between 1976 and 1987 the gap between the average earnings of the top and the bottom 10 per cent. in London increased by 50 per cent.?

Mr. Scott: I shall deal in some detail with equality and the increasing standards of living at the higher and lower levels later in my speech.

Nationally, we have the option of one party or the other being in office. But in London local government, we have the benefit of seeing two separate ideologies at work, two different political philosophies——

Mr. Simon Hughes: And more.

Mr. Scott: The hon. Gentleman's party multiplies so often that it is difficult to tell how many there are at any one moment.

Let us contrast how the two main parties approach their task. The main local authorities dominated by the Labour party are characterised by extravagance, loony left nonsense and absolute contempt for the interests of the ratepayers in their boroughs. Last year, Brent overspent by £104 for every adult in the borough; Camden by £352; Ealing by £100; Greenwich by £178; Hackney by £263; Haringey by £151; and Lewisham by £246. None was underfunded.

Compare that with what happens in Kensington and Chelsea. Three years ago, the council reduced its rates by 30 per cent. It has held its rates steady ever since and provided a first-class service to its ratepayers. It has given a good, effective service and looks forward to the savings that it will make in the not-too-distant future when at last we remove the burden of the Inner London education authority from its back.

Mr. Tony Banks: If the Minister believes that the Labour local authorities are betraying their ratepayers, can he explain why at the previous local elections, the London borough of Newham returned 60 Labour councillors and none from other parties? How did we betray the electors there?

Mr. Scott: I contrast that with our recent victories in two by-elections in Hackney—[Interruption.] We do not have a universal pattern. In some parts of London, at last Labour voters can see the advantages that Conservative administrations can bring them—the freedom to move away from the dull dependence on public landlords and Labour authorities.

I was talking about the prospect of removing the Inner London education authority from the backs of London voters. About 20 per cent. of the school leavers in ILEA leave school with no graded exam results, compared with an English average of half that figure. In 1987-88, ILEA expenditure was 75 per cent. above its grant-related expenditure. If it is argued that ILEA must deal with special inner-city problems in its schools, I say that ILEA spends 50 per cent. more per secondary school pupil than outer London boroughs, and 60 per cent. more than Birmingham, which has similar problems.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): If the Minister complains that ILEA spends 50 per cent. more per pupil, will he explain why the Metropolitan police spend twice as much per head as police forces elsewhere?

Mr. Scott: The Metropolitan police provides specialist services to a number of other forces. In effect, it is a central police resource as well as being the police force for the metropolitan area. ILEA educates 4 per cent. of the children and uses up 8 per cent. of local authority expenditure on education. Children who enter ILEA schools have IQs of the national average, although twice the national average fail to get grade results at the end of their education.

There is no doubt that, at vast expense, ILEA has been failing the children of inner London. I am confident that, when that education is removed to the boroughs, a much better service will be delivered to those youngsters.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): What about the parents?

Mr. Scott: Parents, too, will benefit.

Ms. Harman: They do not want the change.

Mr. Scott: Of course not. The hon. Lady knows that few people face the prospect of change with enthusiasm. They do not like it. They are conservative. With the fears whipped up by the Labour party many people were panicked into thinking that education standards would fall once ILEA was abolished. However, once the new system gets going, no one will want to return to ILEA. Who now worries in London about the death of the Greater London council?

Mr. Tony Banks: I do.

Mr. Scott: There are one or two.

We have heard a great deal about the down-and-outs, those living rough and the youngsters in London whose numbers, we are told, are increasing. The evidence in the DHSS does not support allegations that the numbers sleeping rough have increased under the new rules. The two main offices in central London dealing with itinerant claimants have found an overall decrease in callers since 11 April. DHSS resettlement units in London still have available for homeless people beds which are not taken up.

Mr. Banks: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Scott: I have done much better than the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras in giving way. I always believe in giving way, but it tends to inhibit the natural coherence of the speeches which I like to deliver. However, I shall give way.

Mr. Banks: Is the Minister aware of a pamphlet, which was launched yesterday with all-party support, pointing out the trap into which the single homeless, especially in London, have fallen, because of the social security changes? Income support is paid two weeks in arrears, so people do not have the money to get bed-and-breakfast accommodation. No one will take their word that they will have the money. Is the hon. Gentleman prepared to consider having emergency payments for the single homeless in London and elsewhere?

Mr. Scott: Evidence of the problem is not apparent to DHSS offices—[Interruption.] Perhaps hon. Members could contain themselves for one, brief, shining moment. As reported in The Guardian this morning, I have asked DHSS officials to meet the organisations concerned and to listen carefully to their evidence. Of course we will do that. As I have said about all our social security reforms, we shall monitor carefully and note the impact of changes. As the House will have noticed, we have already made changes to the system of housing benefit and income support to take account of the places where the shoe was pinching unduly harshly.

It comes ill from the Labour party to criticise the Government for failing to help pensioners. The Labour Government presided over levels of inflation which virtually wiped out the savings of pensioners. They failed to pay the Christmas bonus in 1975 and 1976. They failed to honour their commitment to link pensions to earnings——

Ms. Harman: I was not born then.

Mr. Scott: The hon. Lady cannot remember Labour Governments. Perhaps that is just as well, because some of their actions would certainly not square with her compassion. Labour cut the Health Service, reduced pensions in real terms, and so on. I suspect that, so long as the Labour party retains its present leadership, the hon. Lady will not need to worry about assuming the burdens of office, however charmingly she might do it.

I have no hesitation in saying that in London, as in the rest of the country, we have presided over a situation in which the incomes of pensioners have been rising twice as fast as for the population as a whole. We hope that that process will continue during the period of this Government.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Scott: I shall not give way. The hon. Gentleman has just marched in and has not heard any of the speeches. I see no reason to give way. I made it clear when I gave way to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) that I wanted to proceed with my speech.

I suppose that quite a lot of statistics will be bandied across the Floor of the Chamber. We know the old definition of statistics. I remember being told by the young Iain Macleod when he worked in the Conservative research department that Churchill had sent for him and asked for statistics on infant mortality, when what he wanted was one side of a paper which showed that more babies died under Labour Governments than under Conservative Governments. Nevertheless, there are statistical arguments. The Select Committee on Social Services published a report today, and it would not be right for me to comment on it.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras asked about the outcome of the survey of the living standards of the poorest and the richest. It is right that we should have a clear idea of the authoritative statistics. The first and most authoritative statistics we have derive from the family expenditure survey, which describes the position of all those living in households in the lower half of the income distribution. Those statistics offer a wealth of information and repay careful study—[Interruption.] Hon. Members should listen, because they may just learn something.

There is one important message for the debate: in recent years, the living standards of people in all income groups have been rising substantially. Claims that the poor are getting poorer do not stand up to examination. If the Opposition want to find the facts, table A1 of the households below average income statistics shows that between 1981 and 1985, on average, real incomes for the population as a whole rose by no less than 6·4 per cent.

That in itself is a substantial achievement, but it is clear —although I understand that some Opposition Members may wish to ignore this evidence—that the lowest income groups shared fully in that growing prosperity. Between the same years, those in the lowest tenth of the income distribution saw an increase in average real incomes of more than 8 per cent. while those in the lowest 20 per cent. saw an average real terms increase of 6·6 per cent. Not only have the lowest income groups been sharing in the growing prosperity, but, between those years, they did better than the average.

I started by saying that I failed to recognise the description of London given by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras. The Government's overall economic policies have seen not just our country as a whole but London boom and all sections of London society benefiting from that boom. Average weekly earnings are now the highest in the country and unemployment, which is falling steadily, is below the national average. However, many people in London are hit by high rates and the mismanagement of council housing because of the incompetence and indifference of Labour councils.

In London, GDP per capita rose by 92 per cent. between 1979 and 1986. Average weekly earnings in Greater London rose by 5·8 per cent. between April 1986 and April 1987, to become the highest in the country. That is the London in which we live. Unemployment has fallen by 105,000—more than 25 per cent.—since June 1986, and vacancies are steadily increasing. The story is good and London is performing strongly. Youth unemployment has fallen by 33 per cent. from its peak. Government Departments are spending millions of pounds in supporting the urban programme and a number of projects providing training and employment for many people, especially the young.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras particularly mentioned homelessness. Yes, we suffer from homelessness.

Mr. Dobson: The homeless suffer from homelessness.

Mr. Scott: No, as a society we suffer from homelessness. There are 16,000 homeless households in the Greater London area. There are 33,000 empty council homes in the same area—twice as many—and what are local authorities doing to make sure that those empty council properties are brought into use? The Government will make extra capital allocations available to local authorities to help them bring those empty properties into use. Let us hope that they are put to the purpose of solving the problem of homelessness in London.

There is no need for gloom and doom as we contemplate London today. What we need to do is to build on the strength of the economy of this country as a whole and to lift the yoke of Socialism and bureaucracy from the backs of our people, as well as the political ideology of the loony Left councils. We said goodbye to the GLC and nobody shed a tear. Shortly we shall say goodbye to ILEA and nobody will shed a tear except tears of joy as we see education standards improve in our inner city. We are committed to helping all Londoners.

Ms. Harman: What about the crime figures?

Mr. Scott: I shall certainly give the hon. Lady the figures. More serious offences involving violence against the person fell by one fifth in 1987, thus making a substantial improvement.

Living standards are now rising sharply in London, not least among the poor. I recognise that the debate is an attempt to influence the outcome of the Kensington by-election. I very much hope that it will and that it will not be too long before Mr. Dudley Fishburn appears at these doors to take his seat. I commend our amendment to the House.

Ms. Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): I speak as a London Member, as someone who was born and went to school in London and who has worked in London all her working life. I also speak as someone who is tired and weary of the implicit contempt for the people of the inner city that comes out in every statement from the Conservative Benches.

The Minister said that he did not recognise London from the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). Indeed, that would be so—things look different from Chelsea. The Minister talked about figures. He talked about London in the abstract. He talked about GDP. The one thing that he did not talk about was people. I challenge him to come to Hackney, talk to people and ask them, as people, as individuals and as families, whether their GDP has gone up, and whether they feel richer or better off under Thatcherism. I think that he would find that the answer is no.

Sir George Young (Ealing, Acton): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms. Abbott: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to develop my point.

As the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington, I am particularly well placed for observing growing chasm between rich and poor in London. In Hackney, we have the poorest borough in the country but in the south, at the tip of the borough, we see people who have made billions under Thatcherism. We see the contrast there.

At the most recent general election, the Government expressed a wish to do something for the people of the inner city. The Prime Minister said that the Government must now turn their attention to the inner city. She has turned her attention to it much in the way of Hitler's Luftwaffe. Instead of any concern or measures aimed to help the inner city, my people in Hackney have seen legislation in this Parliament that represents a series of hammer blows to their welfare, the welfare of their children, their standard of living and their hopes for the future.

Mr. Scott: Will the hon. Lady explain to us how the Labour party came to lose those two by-elections in Hackney?

Ms. Abbott: If the Minister met the two Conservatives who won in New River ward, particularly Mr. Christopher Sills, he would not be sitting there gloating. They do his party no credit. If the Minister met Mr. Sills, the smile would be wiped off his face. In Hackney we are confident that we shall take those seats back at the next borough elections.

Sir George Young: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms. Abbott: I have already given way. I should appreciate the opportunity to develop my argument before I give way again.

As I said, in Hackney, we have seen a series of hammer blows aimed at our welfare and standard of living.

The Government talk about concern for the inner city year after year, but we are rate-capped in Hackney. The pattern of the allocation of the rate support grant over the eight or nine years of Thatcherist rule has resulted, in relative terms, in taking money away from the poorest and the most deprived in the city and giving it to the shires.

In London and the inner cities, we have also seen a Government bent on a spiteful, ideological holy war against areas whose only fault is that they vote Labour. Under the Government and under Tory boroughs in London we have seen the utter degradation of the notion of municipal virtue. Who would have thought that one would see a responsible London borough sell off its cemeteries for 15p? I am waiting for a single Conservative Member to get up and condemn the activities of Westminster council that have earned it the attention of the fraud squad.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms. Abbott: With the greatest respect, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to develop my point.

Among the hammer blows aimed at Hackney has been the abolition of ILEA——

Mr. Hughes: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms. Abbott: No.

After the abolition of ILEA, Hackney will lose £60 million on present figures. I am waiting for a Conservative Member to get up and make a commitment that we shall not lose money in real terms as a result of abolition. With the prospect of abolition, we face a net loss in money terms and the falling apart of the education system.

On housing, the Minister has sneered at inner-London authorities and the number of empty flats. Inner-London Labour authorities would say to the Minister, "When will you give us the money to do up the flats? When will you allow us to spend the full sum of our receipts on doing up those flats?" The Minister's talk about empty flats would be more impressive if the number of council house starts was not at its lowest for many years under this Government. Also under the Government we see moves to deregulate rents in the housing association sector and the private sector.

On the poll tax, in my constituency, which is the poorest area in the country——

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms. Abbott: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to develop my point.

Mr. Hughes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order to challenge Conservative Members to stand up and answer a point and then refuse to give way? The hon. Lady has done that because she is frightened of what might be said.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Giving way is a matter for the hon. Lady, who has the Floor.

Ms. Abbott: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I thought that that was the case.

In the poorest area in London, we shall pay a poll tax of between £500 and £600 a head. Is that fair?

There have been hospital closures all over Hackney with the resultant problems for services and a loss of jobs in the area.

We heard the Minister talk about the elderly. Will he say what I should tell Mr. Fisher, one of my pensioner constituents, who under the housing benefit changes and despite the transitional arrangements, finds himself with a rent that he cannot pay? He is piling up arrears and is facing the prospect of going to prison. What has the Minister to say to thousands of pensioners in London and elsewhere who cannot pay their rents, despite the transitional arrangements, because of the changes in housing benefit?

The Minister talked about maximising life chances—a wonderful phrase. Will the hon. Gentleman tell me how the Government have maximised the life chances of the girls who come to my surgery, who live in overcrowded flats in fungus-ridden tower blocks with no hope, because of the Government's policies, of ever having decent accommodation? Will the Minister tell me how he has maximised the life chances of the skilled men in my constituency who have been made redundant in their 40s and will never work again? Will the Minister tell me how he has maximised the life chances of the young black men in my constituency who face an unemployment level for young black people in Hackney of one in two? Above all, will the Minister tell us all how this Government have maximised the life chances of the hundreds of people who can be seen every night sleeping out in cardboard boxes on the South Bank and the Embankment?

I believe that, if there is one message that should go out to the electors of Notting Hill—and I speak as someone who was born not far from Notting Hill—on the eve of the by-election, it is that we are seeing a Government who have brought about the greatest and most grotesque contrast between rich and poor in London since Victorian times. Above all—and this has particular relevance to Notting Hill—we are seeing a Government as a consequence of whose policies—the systematic draining of money from council housing, the deregulating of rents in the private sector and housing associations, the extension of the business expansion scheme to private landlords—Rachman will walk again in inner London. That is the message that should go out to the electors of Notting Hill.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): My hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and the Disabled gave us a very sound analysis of the situation, which certainly brought the debate back to reality, and I want to try to continue that reality. Like him, I can claim to know London and be a Londoner. I have represented an inner London marginal constituency for 18 years. I won my council seat, a Socialist seat, from the late Tony Greenwood, and I want no lessons from the Opposition about knowing the problems of Londoners. I noted very carefully the comments of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery), speaking from his normal seated position, which do not help us very much.

The only comment made by the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms. Abbott), when asked why Labour lost two council seats in New River, was to make a vicious personal attack on Christopher Sills, who is a very good councillor and understands the needs of the people. I noticed that she was not able to give the reason. The reason is that people are sick and tired of those who control Hackney from Mare street.

This is a short debate and I shall follow the example—the only time that I am likely to follow his example—of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). I shall give way only once, and then only if I make specific reference to an hon. Member, because I know that a lot of my hon. Friends want to speak.

Of course there is poverty in London. There has always been poverty in London. One has only to look at Hogarth, one has only to read Dickens, to know that full well. There was poverty in London, in the east end, when my grandfather's generation of Jews came over from Russia; there was abject poverty. But those in that generation pulled themselves up by their bootstraps. They wanted no state aid; they wanted no subsidies. That is the contrast between what happened then and what was alleged in "Faith in the City" to be happening.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: No, I will not. I have made my position very clear, and I thought that that would have reached even the hon. Gentleman.

A rundown London, recovering from the war, with a policy of building new towns, which in the main took out the young, active workers from London, was accompanied by a general attitude from what was substantially a Socialist London that could be described, as my hon. Friend said, as levelling down. At that time, profits and enterprise were dirty words. Those who thought that way could not see that people had to be set free in order to rise.

Ms. Abbott: Set free from what?

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I did not interrupt the hon. Lady. Perhaps she might do me the courtesy of not interrupting me.

Winston Churchill had a slogan: set the people free. This was translated into the removal of a mass of controls and restrictions. But, as I want to illustrate a little later, that was not sufficient. He also believed that in the provision of social benefits the ladder to rise out of poverty was perhaps only as important as the safety net to look after the poor, the sick and those who could not help themselves. It took the vision and determination of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to see that the people had to be set free from crippling taxation and that the ladder of opportunity was more important because those climbing it were positively able to help those who still needed the safety net.

What is poverty? It is a combination of deprivation through poor housing, poor health and low incomes—a combination of any or all of these. I should like to analyse those for a moment.

First, let me take poor housing. For almost the entire post-war period London suffered because much of it, particularly inner London, was run by the Labour party, whether the old London county council or the old metropolitan boroughs. My knowledge of the east end of London goes back to fighting seats in Islington, Hackney and Stoke Newington. I know those areas and I know the problems. I saw how people suffered because of the policies adopted by the Labour party in those days. What people wanted in housing was not Ronan Points, but small houses with gardens. I can remember a debate in the House when we were talking about planning in London and blaming the planners for much of the evils of London, and Bob Mellish made it clear that he, like me, endorsed the view that London had been ill served by its planners over those years.

Today, the Labour party has two stock excuses: lack of funds owing to Government policies, and massive homelessness. Both are untrue and largely self-inflicted. If the Labour authorities in London did not have £60 million of uncollected rents, they could do up the 33,000 vacant dwellings without the need to use capital receipts, and rehouse the 16,000 registered homeless. One does not, as all hon. Members—or all hon. Members bar one—know, count arrears of housing rent as capital. It is revenue, and one uses the revenue to do up dilapidated council properties. Thirty-three thousand empty properties, £60 million, 16,000 people—even the Labour party, in spite of the poor education record of ILEA, can do that bit of arithmetic.

On health, all the statistics show that there have been massive improvements. In 1986, the four Thames regions treated 1,792,000 in-patients, compared with 1,610,000 in 1979. They also treated 266,000 day-patients in 1986, compared with 144,000 in 1979 [Interruption.] It is interesting that empty kettles still make the most noise.

In 1979-80, expenditure by the Thames regions was £1·7 billion. In 1986-87, after allowing for inflation, the figure was £3·2 billion, an increase in real terms of over 10 per cent. Had it not been for RAWP, the creature of the Labour party, London would have been even better served. Those two figures put to bed the cant and hypocrisy that we have seen in the past few months from the unions and the Labour party which are trying falsely to claim that under this Government the National Health Service is dying.

The third of my three poverty factors is income. Let us look at the incomes of full-time employees in Greater London. In 1979, average gross earnings were £101·50. In 1987, they had risen to £255·70. If we look at the net amount, we find that in 1979 it was £71·90 and in 1987 it was £169·80. That means that average earnings are up by almost 30 per cent. in real terms. That gives the answer to those that say that Londoners are not doing well.

About 115,000 Londoners have bought their council homes. As those of us who have been in local government know, people are rehoused not according to the size of their bank balance but depending on their housing need. People are slowly—all too slowly—being able to buy their homes and are climbing the ladder, dragging themselves up as they would wish, despite restrictions put on them by authorities such as Camden.

Some of the worst areas of poverty, deprivation and dereliction were in London's docklands which were left to rot for a decade and more because of the interminable internecine battles between the GLC and the London boroughs. The vision of my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) enabled us to put into legislation ideas that some of us had put forward, which said that it was time to remove from the clutches of Labour authorities the people in docklands. We wanted to give them the chance to have their area properly revived.

One merely has to walk through docklands today to see the enormous benefits for the people there. Whether those benefits are new housing or new employment at the London City airport, they are there for those who want to see. The trouble is that many Opposition Members do not want to see them. My hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott) is right. He and I have known each other for a long time. The House would not be discussing this subject if it were not for the impending by-election in Kensington.

The Labour party is not interested in London because its members are no longer in touch with real Londoners. The party does not have people like Bob Mellish or the original Ron Brown. It is a collection of people spewed up by the Left, and they are so out of touch that, in spite of all the evils we are alleged to have committed, there are now more Tory Members in London than at any time in our history. That is because the average Labour voter of the type that existed 20 years ago will not come out and vote for the modern Labour candidate. I do not blame them.

The facts speak clearly for themselves. I remind the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras that just prior to the last general election he and I took part in a radio car interview. In the radio car in Soho square he finished by saying that the Labour party would do well at that election. I was asked if I would be satisfied if we had the same number of seats in London, and I said that I would not and that, as party vice-chairman, I had my eyes set on winning more seats. I was right, and, as so often happens, the hon. Gentleman was wrong.

Mr. Dobson: It was Fitzroy square, not Soho square.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: The hon. Gentleman will remember that the car had to go back twice for equipment. Either the car or I was misdirected. My point is that the hon. Gentleman was wrong in what he said.

If we are to finish the debate on a useful note, we shall have to pay more attention to the way in which we can help people to climb out of poverty. We should do that rather than just increase the size of the safety net. We must realise that it is kinder and wiser to assist people to become more independent and to take responsibility for themselves and their families than to trap them for ever into the dependence on the state that the Opposition want.

My first election was in Islington in 1949. I remember going into the courtyard of a block of flats and hearing the Labour party loudspeaker cars saying, "Come out and vote for the Labour party because it is the party that gave you these flats." If we now ask those tenants whether they want the flats or the right to own them, I know what the answer would be, and so does the House.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): We can all quote statistics. I remind the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) that at the last election, as at the one before, the majority of Londoners voted against his party. Opposition Members representing London constituencies speak for more than half the voters of London.

I want to start with people and not statistics. It will not be surprising if I speak about people that I have come across in the royal borough of Kensington and Chelsea. Yesterday morning I took part in a press conference for my colleague William Goodhart, who is our candidate in Thursday's by-election. On the way back I walked through the underpass at Notting Hill Gate. That underpass leads to the tube station and also serves as a means of crossing the road. I was approached by a young man and a young woman who were begging for money. The young man was called David and was an 18-year-old Scot. The girl was 19 years old and Irish and her name was Renèe. They go to Notting Hill every day because there are rich people in Kensington. They think that in Kensington they may get money, in one case to visit a boy friend outside London or in the other case to buy the other contact lens that David needs.

People are begging in the streets of Kensington in 1988. The two people that I have mentioned squat in Peckham in a one-bedroom flat that houses at least six people every night. They wait for the person who occupies the flat to come home and let them in but last night he did not come home at all and one of them slept in the lift. They do not find London a place of equality of opportunity or choice.

Somebody in my office dug out a short quotation which is perhaps appropriate. It says:

"Whene'er I walk the public ways,
How many poor that lack ablution
Do probe my heart with pensive gaze,
And beg a trivial contribution!"

Perhaps the one quote we have not yet heard from the Prime Minister will say: "For ye have the poor always with you and they are to be blessed." In London there are now more poor people than when the Prime Minister went to No. 10 Downing street.

I should like to mention two other people, who feature on this poster. One is the Duke of Buccleuch and Queensbury, a resident of the London borough of Kensington. He lives in two houses, 44 and 46 Bedford gardens. He pays rates and he will have to pay poll tax, but he will save £1,757 under the poll tax. He and his wife will have to pay about £470. Of course, he voted for that inequitable tax in the other place. In the same area, Fred Leaney works as a porter in a block of flats and lives in Henry Dickens court, W11. He and his wife will have to pay the same amount of poll tax, because they do not qualify for benefit. They will have to pay £433 more than they pay in rates. That is how the Government legislate for equality in London. A porter in a block of flats will pay the same as one of the richest Members of the other place.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Does not the Liberal "Focus" leaflet that the hon. Gentleman produced also say that the community charge will account for only a quarter of the cost of local government and that the Duke will be paying as much as 16 times more for local government than Fred?

Mr. Hughes: The leaflet does not say that, because the principle of taxation, as the hon. Gentleman knows, is that the more one has, the more one pays. The poll tax is different in that the more one has, the less one will pay relatively. That does not make a taxation system more equitable.

Library statistics show—the Minister may challenge me if he wishes—that, between April 1978 and April 1987, the difference between the highest and lowest 10 per cent. of earnings increased by 50 per cent. I concede that both lower and higher earners earned more, but the lower earners increased their earnings by 133 per cent., whereas the higher earners increased their earnings by 199 per cent.

In London in 1980, only 450,000 families—I say "only" —were in receipt of supplementary benefit. By 5 May 1987, 760,000 families were receiving supplementary benefit from offices in Greater London. I know what the Minister will say: if more benefit is paid out, more people will receive it. Supplementary benefit is meant to be the test of basic needs income, and the number of families receiving benefit has nearly doubled in that short time. As the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) said, the real incomes of the richest 10 per cent. rose by 18 per cent. between 1979 and 1985, while the poorest 10 per cent. lost 17 per cent.

Mr. Scott: If the level of benefit is improved, the number of people in poverty will seem to increase. About 60 per cent. of increases in expenditure during this Government's period in office have been accounted for by real-terms increases in the level of benefits rather than by increases in the number of people coming into benefit. The hon. Gentleman should recognise that. Let us take an absurd example: if one doubled the level of supplementary benefit, one would bring a huge number of extra people into poverty. The figures need to be cited with caution.

Mr. Hughes: All Governments in recent times have assessed what is necessary as the basic level of income, to which the state then adds. This Government have fiddled the figures and reduced them several times. The figure below which one is entitled to support has nearly doubled in a few years. The Minister cannot therefore argue that there are not more people relatively poorer in a richer Britain. We are a richer country—of course we are—but the rich are getting richer still and the poor are poorer relative to their fellow citizens. That is the unfairness, and Londoners are sick to death of the inequality practised by the Minister and his colleagues.

I can tell the Minister all about it. I live in docklands —the area praised so graphically by the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg). I know the difference between someone living in a grotty damp council-flat on an estate in Southwark and someone buying a £2·5 million penthouse flat with a view of Tower bridge. That is not equality: it is gross, obscene and absolute degradation.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, according to official statistics, the number of people claiming means-tested benefits increased from 4·4 million in 1979 to 8·2 million in 1987? Does he regard that as one of the problems of success that we have been told about by the Government?

Mr. Hughes: We are a richer country, but the wealth is being divided up in a grossly unfair manner. That is our complaint; it is very simple. A Government who wanted to be fair would not give away massive tax handouts to the rich in the Budget, while people on social security got less. Some pensioner couples in my constituency now have to pay £32 a week for housing instead of £16 a week in April, although they have no more income. That is not fairness, when people in high-paid jobs in the City take home substantial amounts every week—sometimes hundreds and sometimes thousands of pounds in real income.

Three quarters of the London elderly and two thirds of the London disabled are now below the Government's level necessary for supplementary benefit. The hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms. Abbott) accurately said that she represents the borough which, according to the indices of the Department of the Environment, is the poorest local authority in England.

The 10 poorest authorities in England are all in London, and Southwark is also one of them. Even in Tory-controlled Kensington and Chelsea——

Mr. David Evennett (Erith and Crayford): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: I shall not give way.

In Kensington and Chelsea, 30 per cent. of households lack basic amenities in two wards, and in two wards 54 per cent. of people are pensioners living alone. Boroughs have pockets of poverty no matter who runs them. The reason why boroughs such as mine do not elect Tories and why Tories get about 10 per cent. or less of the vote is that poor people do not trust the Conservatives to help them to get richer. They know who will best look after them. It is not the Conservatives. It never has been and it never will be. The Tories look after themselves and their friends first.

Mr. Evennett: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: No, the hon. Gentleman can make his own speech.

Did the great docklands boom reduce unemployment in Newham, Southwark and Tower Hamlets? It did not. Unemployment increased more in those boroughs than in Greater London as a whole. From October 1982 to September 1987, there was a 15·5 per cent. increase in unemployment in the docklands boroughs. I concede that unemployment is now falling, but the jobs are not going to the people who most need them. In July 1986, 51 per cent. of unemployed people in Southwark between the ages of 16 and 24 had been unemployed for more than 26 weeks. The numbers of Southwark's unemployed have doubled in 10 years—not relatively, but in real terms.

Let us consider health. Directly opposite the Labour party's headquarters in Walworth road, a Southwark building carries the slogan

"The health of the people is the highest law".

Having done some research, I gather that that is a quotation from Cicero. The trouble is that health care is not available to all on an equal basis. Let us consider the figures cited by the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate, which show relative benefits to authorities in the Health Service. The four Thames health regions are the only regions to have suffered a 2·8 per cent. real cut between 1982 and 1986. I can give the Minister the evidence to prove it.

Since 1981-82, 14 per cent. of hospital beds have been lost in London and more than 1,400 beds were lost last year. The waiting list for those needing urgent treatment in 1986 made up 29 per cent. of the national list, although London has only 14 per cent. of the population. Last year, the numbers on the waiting list went up nearly 10 per cent. Meanwhile, between 1982 and 1986, there was a 45 per cent. increase in private hospital beds in the four Thames regions. At the same time, the Thames regions had to write off nearly £500,000 of unpaid private hospital bed debts to the health authorities, including £71,000 in Paddington and North Kensington, for people who had already got advantaged treatment.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the number of patients cared for in London has been rising steadily? For example, the number of day cases in inner London went up from 48,000 to nearly 80,000 between 1982 and 1986 and the number of accident emergency attendances has increased. Does he agree that for many years, including 1986, inner London has had twice the number of acute beds per thousand of the population as the rest of the country and twice the number of consultants and junior doctors?

Mr. Hughes: Very good. The Minister's colleagues are easily deceived. Of course the figures are true, but many people who have received health care in London come from outside. Also, many of the people covered by the Department's throughput appear twice or more in the figures because they were discharged so quickly that they had to go back to hospital. The figures are not all different people. They are the same people, often the elderly, who were sent home and readmitted. They could not stay in hospital to convalesce, because the beds were needed for other people to leap into as soon as they were pushed out.

The private sector has benefited. Private sector recruitment has grown at the expense of the Health Service. Beveridge and Nye Bevan sought to provide not a Health Service that would be selectively available for those who could pay, but a Health Service for all, free at the point of delivery.

In social services there is exactly the same crisis in London, with 600 suspected victims of child abuse not getting professional help because there are no social workers to help them.

In education, before the Government's reforms the borough of Westminster pays 27 per cent. of the bill for ILEA but receives only 6·5 per cent. of the available money. After abolition, Westminster will have a massive windfall to spend on three county secondary schools whereas a borough like Greenwich which pays 2·5 per cent. spends 10·3 per cent. and, like Tower Hamlets and Hackney, will have to pay massively more.

I will end where I began, with the homeless. Last year, there were 30,000 registered homeless in greater London. The number had gone up by 75 per cent. in five years. That excluded the 10,000 in hostels, the 12,500 who were squatting, the 2,000 approximately who were sleeping rough, and many who were staying temporarily with friends. There were about 64,000 homeless people in the capital city last year.

Houses are being built in my borough, but at an average price of £80,000, where the average income in only £8,000. There is not much prospect of many of the homeless, let alone the homeless who are out of work, getting accommodation. There are more than 1·5 people per room in many homes in many boroughs—Kensington and Chelsea, Southwark, Camden and Haringey first among them.

The reality of Britain today is that the challenge that Beveridge, Nye Bevan, Lloyd George and others sought to put before the country has been grossly neglected by the Conservative Government. Beveridge, who was a resident of Kensington, where he had his first home—

Mr. Tony Banks: Had he a vote?

Mr. Hughes: He did have a vote to begin with, but not there when he became a Member of Parliament. He said:

"Liberals believe that our guiding force should not be self-interest or class conflict but the determination not to rest while any are condemned to want, disease, squalor, ignorance or unemployment."

That resident of Kensington would not have been voting Conservative in Kensington on Thursday, nor anywhere else in London, because the challenge which he gave us has been grossly neglected by this increasingly divisive and self-interested Tory Government.

5.14 pm

Mr. David Evennett (Erith and Crayford): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on his excellent speech, which was not only thought-provoking and interesting, but put the case fairly and squarely for London as it is today. [Interruption.] I should be grateful if the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms. Abbott) would at least listen for once, not only because it would be courteous, but because it would be educational for her.

I was disappointed that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) would not give way to me. I was appalled at how frightened he seemed to be, and also distressed at his view. He seemed to suggest that he would have preferred a derelict wilderness in docklands. We all know that docklands had died and needed to be rejuvenated. Many people who work in docklands are grateful for the development that has taken place, because they have jobs in an area where there were no jobs before.

I am delighted that today we are having a debate on London. As a London Member, I believe that we have too few debates on our great capital. I know that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) is of a similar opinion. I am disappointed and surprised, because the Opposition motion does not give a true picture of London today. I am a Londoner, having always lived in Greater London. I worked in London and I represent an outer London constituency. My parents were Cockneys, born in Bow in the 1920s. I know what things were like in their early years in east London. My grandparents also came from Bow, and throughout my life I have heard of the real hardship, suffering and deprivation in London in the 1920s.

Ms. Abbott: Not now, of course.

Mr. Evennett: Again the hon. Lady is not willing to listen to my speech, although she has already made hers. That is symptomatic of what is wrong with the politics of London from the Left. They are unwilling to listen to the points of view of other people who were also born in London and who have been involved in Hackney. I shall give the hon. Lady a few lessons on that in a moment. She seems to be living in the past. She seems to glory in the past, and she refuses to look at the present and the future.

We are looking to the future for London. No one pretends that everything is perfect in London, because it is not. We accept that there is homelessness and deprivation in the capital city. We want to try to improve the position and change the lot of those who are homeless.

Ms. Abbott: How?

Mr. Evennett: I shall make my own speech in my own time without comment.

Mr. James Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): And a very good speech it is.

Mr. Evennett: The Opposition do not like it. There are more ordinary Londoners on these Benches than on the Opposition side.

I was involved in Hackney in the 1970s. I was a parliamentary candidate in 1979, and I was a school manager and governor in the borough of Hackney from 1976 to 1980. I was distressed by the standard of education that was provided in Hackney at that time. [Interruption.] I was a teacher in outer London, but I was a governor of a number of Hackney schools and I was a school manager. I was appalled at how ILEA had allowed the children of Hackney to receive inferior education. I could not believe that children who in the past had had good schools had no passport to a good future because of the poor education being provided in Hackney.

The position in the 1980s is even worse than it was in the 1970s, and for that reason ILEA's abolition will be good for Hackney, for the children of Hackney and for inner London in general. Much money was spent on ILEA and on Hackney schools, but to little effect, and the children there were left without a decent education. That is one of the real deprivations in London, but it is a problem that the Opposition will not face. Under Labour control ILEA has failed the children of London, and Hackney is a classic example of where that has occurred.

My own home borough of Bexley is Conservative-controlled and provides excellent education, whereas neighbouring Greenwich is under ILEA control. A number of parents from Greenwich come to see me, wanting their children to be educated in Bexley schools because the standards there are better. That cannot be right. It must be unfair to Greenwich children that they are receiving an inferior education. The Government have put forward many policies to improve the lot of children and of education, which must be welcomed.

In the matter of housing, there is a chapter of woe to be read about many London areas. Many Londoners wanted to buy their own council homes, but only the Conservative Government allowed them to realise that ambition. Opposition Members were not interested in the aspirations of those ordinary people and voted against council house sales, yet those sales have been a tremendous success story. People now have an opportunity to do as they want with their own home and no longer have to conform to the painted front door that the council insisted they had. That is what the Government offered them.

Not everyone can own his home, and there is still an important place for the public housing sector, which we believe is right. However, we cannot support that sector —I am sorry that the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington did not mention this either—when, as was the case in Hackney for many years, councils will not sell off large areas of derelict land for development. It is no use the hon. Lady complaining 10 years later that there are not enough council houses, when part of the reason for that is that in the 1970s Hackney council refused to sell land for development, to provide more homes.

We hear also of the number of empty council houses in Greater London. The public would be appalled if they knew that there are about 30,000 empty council dwellings in Greater London. That is scandalous. The hon. Members for Southwark and Bermondsey and for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington mentioned the homeless. In Greater London there are about 30,000 empty homes. Something must be very wrong, and we ought not tolerate such a situation.

My hon. Friend the Minister said that one can interpret statistics in any way one likes, but the fact remains that most people living in the capital are enjoying a higher standard of living than ever before. There will always be a less fortunate minority, and my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) reminded the House that the poor are always with us and that they should receive the help that they need.

However, the vast majority of people, at whatever level and whatever their income, are better off now than they have ever been. I refer not only to their income but to their status. A higher percentage of households include in their possessions the so-called luxuries of life, such as tumble driers, washing machines and television sets. We welcome that and would like to see more and more people enjoying such possessions. We do not want to depress the number of people who already have them, but wish to elevate those who do not, so that everyone may enjoy a better standard of living.

Over the past decade most Londoners have enjoyed advances in their living standards and quality of life. More has to be done, and action is being proposed by the Government—but only by the Government. It would be disastrous just to throw more money at the problems that exist, because that will not solve anything. What is required is an investment in housing, education and employment. As ILEA has shown, throwing money at problems does not bring results. We must pursue instead a constructive programme, which is something that the Government are doing.

The Opposition motion proves that the Labour party is out of date and out of touch. It is out of touch with reality, out of touch with the wishes of the people of London, and out of touch with 1988. I look forward to the Government's reforms for dealing with those London areas that require urgent attention. When the Education Reform Bill, the community charge, housing reform and so on, are on the statute book and operational, more of London's problems will be attacked and solved. We shall not see that being done by following the lines of the Opposition motion. It is a trip into yesterday, and yesterday is history. We are looking instead to the future, for all of London's people.

Ms. Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): When a proper audit is undertaken of the effect of the Government's policies on the people of London, the indictment will be devastating. The Government will be condemned for promoting the ethic of greed and self-interest as foundation stones for our society. It is an ethic based on the pauperisation of the many to enhance the wealth of the few. I hesitate to use even the word "ethic" to describe a set of values that are so uncaring, so damaging and so complacent that the Prime Minister could stand at the Dispatch Box one month ago and say:

"Everyone in the nation has benefited from the increased prosperity."—[Official Report, 17 May 1988; Vol. 133, c. 796.]

It is obvious that the Government are applying their usual technique for dealing with a problem, and have redefined the word "everyone". To be included in the Prime Minister's concept of "everyone", one must be more than a citizen of this country. It means also having a job, owning a car and a house, having shares, and paying for private health care. As Orwell would have appreciated, "everyone" really means being part of an elite.

"Everyone" does not include those without a job, those who do not own a valuable property, or the young forced to live a nomadic life moving from one bed-and-breakfast place to another. Neither does it include YTS trainees stuck on a scheme, the women who are struggling on income support, or the many of my constituents who have not seen any "prosperity". Instead, those people are by all means possible to vanish from the statistics, from the benefit system, and ultimately even from the electoral register—thus relieving the Government of any burden of responsibility.

In their deconstruction and redefinition of society, the Government are undertaking the task of taking apart the welfare state, that symbol of collective provision. In its place they have resurrected the concept of the individual within the family as an ideal social unit. If I understand the theory properly, it follows that those units are to operate within the free market, creating wealth that then results in the abolition of poverty as the incomes of the poor are pulled up by economic growth. That has not worked in the past, and it is not working now.

The Prime Minister recently enunciated the requisite moral values that underpin this organisation of society: self-reliance, personal responsibility, good neighbourliness and generosity. According to her, those are traditional values of British life which have been undermined by state intervention to a point of moral crisis. We have had nine years in which to assess the validity of those beliefs. All the figures show that, far from abolishing poverty, the Government's policies are widening the gulf between the rich and the poor. There is a liberalising state structure for the rich, but an increasingly authoritarian structure for the poor, in which the state polices their activities and punishes them for their poverty.

I rarely agree with the Prime Minister, but I agree that people want self-reliance, self-respect and responsibility. All my constituents want those things, but it is an act of cynicism and hypocrisy to praise such values on the one hand and on the other to push through a range of policies designed to constrict and stifle people's independence and freedom. It is clear that just as "everyone" means only some, true self-reliance and independence are to be available only to the rich.

This year's Budget was a clear example of that, favouring the rich at the expense of the poor. The Chancellor's £6 billion handout was apportioned thus: 31 per cent. for those with incomes already over £50,000 and 2 per cent. for those with incomes under £5,000. Do the Ministers sitting opposite me really not believe that that reflects the growing divide in this capital city? The Budget was a blatant example of the Government's basic strategy of increasing the earnings of the highly paid as an incentive, while at the same time holding down the wages of the low paid through deregulation of employment, job schemes linked to low pay and the constant fear of unemployment.

In Lewisham, we see at first hand how Government policies are accentuating the divide in our society. There, the divide has widened. A recent study conducted by Goldsmiths' college shows that, across a wide range of indices, poverty and deprivation are increasing. One in eight people are still unemployed, and in some of my wards 40 per cent. of young people are without work. Two in five households receive housing benefit and 32,000 receive income support. Lewisham and Deptford in particular rank high among authorities with one-parent families, overcrowded conditions, a lack of amenities and single-pensioner households—which, combined with the loss of manufacturing jobs and a decaying environment, has led to multiple deprivation and an increase in poverty. I defy Conservative Members, two of whom also represent Lewisham, to say that that is not the case, and that constituents have not come to their surgeries complaining of such problems.

In such circumstances, the local authority plays a vital role in providing services and support. But Lewisham, of course, is rate-capped and has been for years, by a Government whose prime motive is not to help individuals and communities to improve their lives, but to silence and marginalise a dissenting voice. Nowhere has the Government's fight against Labour authorities hurt our community more than in the cuts imposed on social services in Lewisham: cuts that affect the quality of life for all except the ultra-rich.

None of us—home owners, dual-income families or even yuppies—can be sure that we will never need our social services departments. The private health scheme and the private school soon abdicate responsibility for the most acute problems. To meet the budget constraints imposed by the Government, Lewisham's social services department has had to close two homes for the elderly, two children's homes, two day centres for the active elderly and a holiday centre that catered for no fewer than 1,800 people a year.

Where is the freedom, dignity and personal responsibility allowed to those people and their families? They have paid all their lives for that provision, and the Government are denying it to them. Such people do not seek an act of charity; they seek the community rights of the society that we used to enjoy. In every aspect of Government policy, there has been a deliberate acceleration and legitimising of the two-tier society.

The Government have long promoted the idea of a property-owning democracy geared towards owner-occupation for those who can afford it and rented accommodation for those who cannot. But my constituents have an average income equal to only two thirds of that in the south-east as a whole. Most of them will never be able to purchase even a one-bedroomed flat with today's escalating London prices. Many must therefore rely on public sector housing, which the Government have starved of funds since 1979.

Why are the Government so determined to destroy publicly owned, affordable housing in London? Why are they determined to make second-class citizens of people who work in jobs that do not happen to finance a £50,000 mortgage? Against all those odds, Lewisham council cannot deal with the problems of homelessness and bad housing. Its housing investment allocation for this year is only £18 million. If that programme were being funded at the same level as in 1979, it would have received £70 million. Where does the fault lie but with the Government?

Nowhere is the problem more acute than in our tower blocks—cruel monuments indeed to middle-class architects who would never have chosen to live in them. Such is the present housing shortage that people who obtain their first flat in such a block are condemned to stay there when they start a family, because Lewisham council is allowed no new building. How many Conservative Members would care to struggle up 13, 14 or 15 floors with 18-month-old twins and the shopping when the lift is out of order? Why should people who pay their rents and are prepared to be independent be penalised because the Government will not allow the council money to repair their blocks?

Let me now turn to education. In Lewisham, parents, governors and teachers are resisting a proposal to turn the Haberdasher's Aske's schools into a city technology college. Such colleges were intended to be financed by industry to provide young people with a technological education. They are to exist entirely outside the state system, and their implicit role is to be that of the elitist school. They are to have funds to pay for better equipment and higher salaries for teachers. They will take our education back into the two-tier system.

It is rumoured that the Government are prepared to put £4 million into the creation of a CTC in Deptford—£4 million to destroy effective comprehensive education in that area, where real equality of opportunity has been constructed through a five-school consortium. Yet again, we see elitism triumph over the provision of education for all. When I see the willingness of the Government to pour money into projects such as the CTC, which will benefit only a minority, I know that Conservative Members have no wish to close the growing divide in London.

Last week, the Prince of Wales visited Deptford and praised the efforts of the people there, as he put it, to break "this terrible vicious circle" of deprivation. I echo his praise. I hope that the Government will stop blaming the poor for being poor and will take on board the many expressions of concern being voiced about the effects of polarisation of rich and poor. I bleieve that the Government, who ally themselves closely to a policy of self-interest and promotion of the rich at the expense of the poor, are coming dangerously close to authoritarianism.

In my constituency, the ideas and initiatives that are still to be found in our schools, community projects and workplaces are a tribute to the energy and enthusiasm that motivate people to improve their lives, despite the Government's indifference and active obstruction. Whatever the entreaties of Conservative Members and Ministers, we will continue to join those people in their struggle for self-improvement, better communities and better environments. We live among them and travel on public transport and see what is happening. We know that the squalor of our environment is not due to our neglect or the neglect of our councils, but to the policies of the Government. I commend to the House the motion in the names of my right hon. and hon. Friends.

5.41 pm

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I do not doubt the sincerity of the hon. Members for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) and for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). However, let the House not listen to what they say, but watch what the Socialists and Liberals do. I have lived and taught in Tower Hamlets, and I have taught in London schools for 23 years. Twelve of them were in the King's Cross area and seven were in deprived parts of Lewisham. There were children of 95 nationalities. I take no lessons in deprivation or knowledge of ethnic minorities from Liberals or Socialists.

I remind the House that between them the Liberal party and the Labour party have controlled local government in Tower Hamlets for nearly 90 years. Billions of pounds of public money has been poured into that community, but one sees a concrete jungle of deprivation, unimaginatively and badly planned housing and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) said, communities destroyed by the corrupt administrations that we have seen over the years. We have seen appalling planning and people not being consulted.

I know from experience--I have fought three general elections in east London——

Mr. Tony Banks: How did the hon. Gentleman get on?

Mr. Greenway: Very well. When I went to speak in the docks against Jack Dash and others, often with the Bishop of Stepney, then Trevor Huddleston, I did not see the Socialist Member of Parliament.

In that society in the east end there is no grass, except for that around the high-rise blocks. There are concrete playgrounds for children, and if they want to play soccer they have to play on concrete. All recreational facilities are concrete. That area, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate reminded us, used to be full of fine open green spaces. That is Socialism and Liberalism at work. The hon. Member for Deptford believes what she said, but that is not the way that Socialism works in practice.

The homeless have been much discussed in the debate so far. I shall tell the hon. Member for Deptford about the homeless in the London borough of Ealing. When the present Labour council took control in May 1986 there were 30 families on the homeless register, costing the people of Ealing £300,000 a year. The council promptly abolished residence points, which took away the right to be housed, from people born and bred in the borough and who had lived there for two years or more. It sucked in all sorts of people from all over the country and all over the world who had no relationship with Ealing. Within a year there were 1,000 people on the waiting list, at a cost of £13 million or £14 million. If two homosexuals are living together and then quarrel and decide to part, the council believes that they must be housed separately, so that uses two housing units. That is but one example of why there is an increased need for housing.

Ms. Abbott: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Greenway: I shall not give way to the hon. Lady. Let her go back to Cambridge. She did not give way to anybody.

That is one of the ways in which homelessness and the demand for housing has increased. The Labour party needs to think about what it has done to the people.

Homeless people come to see me in my surgery.—[Interruption.] I have at least one surgery every week, sometimes two and sometimes I have a surgery every day. Those people will give me addresses of properties that have been empty for two years or more. They say, "Can I have that home? Will you write to the director of housing?" Somebody told me about a house that had been empty for three years. I wrote to the director of housing some seven months ago and asked for that home to be allocated to a lady. He wrote back and told me that it was already allocated. Three months later the lady came back to see me and said that there was still nobody living in it, so I tried again. Three months later the lady came back again and said that there still nobody in it. I have just written again to the director of housing, but I shall get the same answer. That needs to be sorted out. I commend my hon. Friend the Minister for tackling that problem.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Greenway: I shall give way once to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Tony Banks: That is very decent of you, Harry.

No Opposition Member would defend a system whereby empty council properties are kept empty because a council does not know that the property is empty. One understands that that happens. However, will the hon. Gentleman accept that 72 per cent. of all empty properties in Greater London are in the private sector? The largest number, in percentage terms, are owned by Government Departments.

Mr. Greenway: I am not talking about council properties where the council does not know that they are empty. I have given an example in which the council was told by me that a property was empty, and I was being rung daily by people who wanted to move into the property. The councils know which properties are empty. The hon. Gentleman is attempting to mislead the House and it is mischievous of him to do so. I am sure that he does not mean it.

I have visited the Embankment homeless regularly in the worst of winters. A great deal of insincere cant is talked about those people. The truth is that many of them have refused to go into accommodation. That is not to say that I condone the fact that anyone is in that position. I have attempted on many occasions to persuade people to get out of that situation. Sometimes, even in the most bitter weather, one cannot persuade them to go into hostel accommodation, which I find for them. During the terrible winter before last I suggested, both in the House and outside, to anyone who was interested that we should do something. I said, "Open your halls, open this and that and take them in." I explained that those people would die outside on those terrible nights. Only the Salvation Army responded. What a fine job it does. It has a right to speak about the problem, but that does not apply to many Opposition Members, including the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey.

Learned articles in The Sunday Times, The Observer, and other reputable newspapers and journals have described people who own cars and have petrol allowances as being in poverty. One has to be honest when one talks about poverty. If one investigates the word "poverty" in the Oxford Dictionary, it is clear that someone who is in poverty has absolutely nothing—virtually no food to eat, virtually no clothes to wear and no home. We are not talking about poverty in London in those terms, and it is hypocrisy for the Labour party to table a motion in such terms. I hope that the House will reject it strongly and thoroughly.

A very serious form of poverty is poverty through education. It has been said in Ealing, it has been said by the Labour party today, and I have heard it said by many Socialists, that one must not push children of a single parent, or children from ethnic minority backgrounds, especially if they are poor, because they are deprived and cannot take the pressure. One cannot do children a bigger disservice than to push such a policy.

Mr. Bernie Grant (Tottenham): Will the hon. Member give way?

Mr Greenway: No, I shall not give way.

If ever children need extra help and pressure to succeed it is the children of single parents, and children from deprived backgrounds, whether they are white or from an ethnic minority background. We have heard such sentimentalism from the Labour party in London and elsewhere for many years.

I have marked the examination papers of such children at CSE and O-level—not at A-level, as they did not get that far—for many years. Their lack of a good grasp of English shows that they have not been pushed in the way that they could have been pushed and their grasp of the language improved. Such an improvement would have enabled them to write better examination papers and they would have been better equipped for work. That serious deprivation has emanated from parts of the ILEA and from other Labour authorities.

For 20 years, the education of children in secondary schools in London was secondary to the reorganisation plans of the ILEA and the old LCC, which wanted to create a unitary system of education which they hoped would produce a flank of Socialists right across London and lead to the end of Conservatism. The education of those children was secondary to that political aim. That was disgraceful and should not be forgotten. That generation will be deprived for life, and that is well known.

Finally, rates have rightly been mentioned in the debate. Let us examine what the Labour party does in power, and consider the rates damage in Ealing. In Ealing last year the Labour council increased rates by 65 per cent. Poor people, old people and deprived people went without food to pay their rates. For some of them, that huge increase cost hundreds of pounds in a year. In addition, the rates on factories went up and there was a £500,000 rates increase for Ealing hospital—that from a party that cares so much about the sick and about the NHS.

To take one example, the £750,000 rates increase for Lyons in Greenford meant that the price of tea, Ready Brek, ice cream, puddings and so on went up.

Mr. Tony Banks: Nonsense.

Mr. Greenway: Where could it find £750,000, other than from increased prices? Some employees also lost their jobs. My constituents have been struggling to pay a 65 per cent. rates increase and the higher cost of tea and food.

Ms. Ruddock rose——

Mr. John Fraser rose——

Mr. Greenway: No, I shall not give way. I have given way once and I shall not give way again.

Even the price of hair cuts went up by 50p. What a way to run a borough.

If I have not got my point across to Opposition Members, may I stress that within the past month Ealing council, which has £192 million to spend, compared with £151 million only two years ago—an increase of £41 million—has stopped all discretionary grants to pay for an extension or an extra downstairs lavatory for disabled people in Ealing. That is wicked.

Mr. Tony Banks: It is also not true.

Mr. Greenway: It is absolutely true. It has not been denied. The hon. Gentleman should get his facts right. I have council letters to prove it.

A family in Costons avenue, Greenford, with two severely disabled sons aged 23 and 20, need downstairs accommodation for them. They negotiated a grant and worked out with an architect what was needed and were all ready to go. But that grant has been stopped by a council which does not care a damn about the disabled. Those two young men still cannot live at home. It cares only about its own equality policy. It will put on a party costing £1,000 for lesbians with the Hot Doris band, but it will not give grants to disabled people who need them.

There are fewer home helps, and those who need them get them less regularly. The council has allowed people to be violated by unchecked invasions of gipsies—in one area, 12 times in three months. That is the extent of the mis-spending in Ealing. The council is seeking to put a second playground next to a perfectly good existing playground, in Perivale park, at a cost of £16,000. It spends millions of pounds on Labour party propaganda in "Voices", its own magazine, and in other ways.

People in Ealing were very pleased when the Secretary of State for the Environment rate-capped Ealing for the current year and rates were forced down by 25 per cent., but they are trembling in their shoes because Ealing is not rate-capped for next year. Just to stand still, rates will go up by a minimum of 50 per cent., and they will probably go up a great deal more. That is Socialism. That is what a so-called caring Socialist party, or SLD party, means in practice. Let the House know about it, and let it throw out the motion this evening.

5.57 pm

Ms. Mildred Gordon (Bow and Poplar): The hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) made a speech which seemed to owe more to his imagination than to reality. I grew up in Tower Hamlets, and before the war most people there lived in the most dreadful hovels. The council housing that he decried was the biggest slum-clearance scheme in Europe. The people who received a council house received a new life. At that time the caring Tories were saying, "It is no use giving working people a bath; they will only put coal in it." That way of thinking still exists today.

Tower Hamlets is one of the poorest boroughs in London, and certainly in England, and, according to figures published in 1984, 70 per cent. of households survive on £6,000 per annum. Conservative Members should think about what that means, if their imaginations will take them that far. The link between poverty and ill health has now been proven. While richer London boroughs, such as Bromley and Sutton, have death rates comparable with those in Europe and the United States of America—the richer countries in the world—the death rate for men in the poorer parts of Tower Hamlets is comparable with those in Uruguay and Argentina. The standard mortality rate for Tower Hamlets is the highest in London.

Professor Peter Townsend, a social scientist of world renown, recently condemned the Government for pursuing policies that promoted poverty, and therefore ill health. His words have been illustrated dramatically by the report of the Social Services Select Committee which is published today, the majority on which, as hon. Members know, are Conservative Members. The Observer says that the report shows:

"The number claiming means-tested state benefits has climbed from 4·4 million, when Mrs. Thatcher first took office, to 8·2 million."

That is nearly double. The report says:

"another million live below the level of meagre benefits but do not claim."

The Government's policies have doubled the number of people who live in dire poverty. The result is early and untimely death for many of my constituents. I can justifiably say that, because of that, the Thatcher Government's policies are annihilation policies for many people.

Time after time, the Government utter pious words about the Health Service and how the health of our people is safe in their hands, but a healthy population cannot be achieved just by tinkering with the NHS. That view was expressed most eloquently by the British Medical Association Board of Science and Education report of 1987, entitled, "Deprivation and Ill Health," which says:

"No amount of redistribution of resources within the health and social security sector will resolve the health problems caused by deprivation. Increased resources for housing, work creation, income support, education and health and social services are needed although low cost initiatives are possible which will alleviate the health experience of some disadvantaged groups. The problem is so great and so entrenched within these structures of society as to be insoluble without significant diversion of public resources."

It is such a significant diversion of public resources that the Government constantly refuse to make, whether to health and social services or to anything else. As a result, the problems are perpetuated.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): My hon. Friend is right when she says that the Government refuse to give figures about deprivation. They gave what they called the Z scores index of multiple deprivation on the 1981 census, which showed that 11 out of 12 areas in London were deprived and that 16 out of the 24 most deprived areas were in London. Those are the Department of the Environment's calculations of deprivation.

Ms. Gordon: I am grateful for that information.

The divide is widening. I should like to give the Government's own figures. The Department of Employment family expenditure survey for 1980 to 1986 shows changes in gross household incomes at 1985 prices. Between 1979—a significant date for poor people—and 1985, the income of the bottom decile—10 per cent.—fell by 10 per cent., and the income of the bottom quartile —25 per cent.—fell by 7 per cent. During the same period, the income of the top decile rose by 10 per cent. and the income of the top quartile rose by 12 per cent. It is therefore clear from the Government's figures that the poor are getting poorer and the rich are getting richer.

The figures for Greater London are even worse. The income of the bottom decile fell by 17 per cent. and that of the bottom quartile by 8 per cent. The income of the top decile rose by 12 per cent. and that of the top quartile by 18 per cent. So much for prosperity! The rich got their share, but the incomes of the poor deteriorated. That problem has been exacerbated by the Budget, but the Government hide what they do not like. They have now stopped compiling the figures in the form that I have just mentioned, so comparisons can no longer be made.

Yesterday, the Minister for Housing and Planning announced that a housing action trust will be set up in Tower Hamlets. People were shocked to hear that announcement, even before the Housing Bill has gone through Parliament. Council tenants are in ferment, and have been since they first heard of the Housing Bill.

It has been asserted today that nobody cared about the Greater London council being abolished. Poor people in Tower Hamlets cared very much. The GLC built excellent houses in the borough and the Inner London education authority has cared about children's education there. People's right to elect whom they please to run their schools and to build council dwellings has been eroded by the Government.

The people of Tower Hamlets feel that the Government have declared war on Londoners—they have abolished the GLC and they propose to abolish ILEA. My mailbag reflects the dreadful fear of old people in Tower Hamlets that they will lose their homes. I receive many letters asking whether the Government will prevent them from living out their old age in the council flats where they have lived for years. They see the safety net being ripped from under them. The outlook is grim. They see ward and hospital closures and the education authority being destroyed. Benefits are being cut. Their circumstances are getting worse rather than better.

Conservative Members are in cloud-cuckoo-land when it comes to what is happening in poor areas. Those who go to Bethnal Green tube station will see women and small children begging. I have not seen that in the east end since the 1920s. That is the pass that the very poorest people have come to, and it is a disgrace for one of the major cities in the world in one of the richest countries in the world.

The Government's game of dividing communities to deflect attention from their policies works for just so long. In my maiden speech a little over one year ago, I said that Londoners in the east end will fight back. They are beginning to rally to do just that. The London Docklands development corporation taught those people a sharp lesson. They saw that dictatorship being set up and public money being poured in, but there was a net loss of jobs and increased unemployment. They saw houses being built, but for £200,000, which they could never afford. They knew that it was not to benefit them.

They now know a quango when they see one, and the housing action trust will be just the sort of dictatorship in housing that the LDDC has been in docklands.

They are reacting violently against it, and they regard the HAT as a con trick. First, the rate support grant was taken away; our taxes were stolen; then Tower Hamlets was rate-capped and it was announced on Thursday that it would be rate-capped again. So there is no money for repairs. Then the Government say that the estates are in a state of disrepair so they will take away the democratic right of the elected authority to handle them and put them in the hands of an appointed quango.

A few weeks ago, the new rich who have moved into Tower Hamlets on the Isle of Dogs held a charity ball to raise money for the London hospital—at £200 a ticket. Local people were shocked. That is the divide between rich and poor, between people living on less than £6,000 a year and those who have moved in and can afford £200 a night. The local people do not want their hospitals funded in that way. They had enough of charity hospitals before the war, and that does not please them one bit.

I am reminded that the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), writing in the Sunday Telegraph a few weeks ago, said that we must honour the philanthropists of the past century who provided money to build schools, hospitals and workhouses. The people of Tower Hamlets are not going back to the workhouse. The Government have a workhouse mentality and workhouse aspirations for the poor of this country.

There is a ferment in Tower Hamlets. Last week a local tenants' meeting was held on a small estate. We thought it would bring out about 40 people—but they had to shut the doors because 800 people turned up from all around. On Thursday the tenants' federation is calling a meeting to discuss what to do. I warn the Government that in Tower Hamlets anyone who lives near the river, or a canal, park or any other desirable natural space feels threatened. They believe that their houses will be grabbed, that they will be squeezed out and that the new HAT will eventually cause rents to go up so that they will not be able to afford to pay them and will have to leave. They will be pushed out by people who now find the area desirable for various reasons that we all know well.

I warn the Government that they have been pushing people too far. An explosive situation is building up in east London. People are saying that they will fight to defend their homes and that Government policies will not help them. Their lives have become much worse since 1979, and they are in no doubt about that.

Mr. Cohen: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. During the excellent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Ms. Gordon) the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) was reading a newspaper—he is still doing it now, or perhaps he is eating his chips off it.

I see that only two Conservative Members representing London constituencies are present. Does that not show a contempt for the problems of London?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I was working on the assumption that if an hon. Member was reading a newspaper he was preparing his speech, but I remind the House that in other circumstances it is not in order to read newspapers.

6.15 pm

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): I want to make three brief points. First, I want to challenge the nature of what we are debating. We are discussing the gap between the rich and the poor, and we have been told by Opposition Members that it has widened. On the face of it, that seems a reasonable proposition. Opposition Members have produced statistics to back it up—even Members on the Opposition Front Bench, who seem to have spent all afternoon playing musical chairs, coming and going and not listening much to the debate.

People want a reasonable society with a sense of justice and fair play, so the remarks of Opposition Members might strike a chord. But they are not based on reality. To believe what Opposition Members have said, one would have to believe that the mere existence of some who are wealthy impoverishes people with less money—and I do not believe that. There are people in parts of my constituency who live in the stockbroker belt, earn substantial incomes, possess Rolls-Royces and live in houses that are worth anything up to £1 million. That compares with my income as an hon. Member and the rather more modest house that I live in. So one would have to believe, to follow Opposition Members' arguments, that the existence of such people impoverishes me, which is not true.

Neither has this ever been true of London. London has always been a patchwork quilt of poor and wealthy areas co-existing. But to say that because more people are wealthy in London others are impoverished is nonsense. Opposition Members know it is nonsense; more importantly, the people of London know it is and will not fall for it.

Mr. Corbyn: Exactly what useful work did those stockbrokers do to gain their enormous wealth, other than to exploit the people who work in industry, to take their money away and to make no useful contribution to society? Does the hon. Gentleman think that the working people of London are so stupid as not to realise that stockbrokers are parasites?

Mr. Hughes: That remark is part of the pattern. Perhaps to try to keep its spirits up, the Labour party tries to make us believe that areas of London that used to be Labour's strongholds, such as Walthamstow and Battersea—and Leyton soon—are giving increasing numbers of votes to the Conservatives because so-called yuppies are moving into them. But canvassing in working-class areas contradicts that notion. The constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) is an ex-Labour stronghold which now has a 15,000 Conservative majority, which was created not by yuppies or stockbrokers but by people on council estates who had been lifelong Labour voters but came over to the Conservatives.

What is the legacy of Labour in London? In places such as Tower Hamlets, the Labour party deliberately created a captive vote. It set out to control from the council the vast majority of housing in an area, and what a terrible job it made of that control. The party thought that the only way to build political control was to own property. It was warned about that in the last part of the last century. It was told that it should not control the votes of the people and collect their rents.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale): Who said that?

Mr. Hughes: The hon. Gentleman should look at the works of Mrs. Hill, who created the National Trust. He should also learn something about London, instead of interrupting the debate in his broad Glaswegian accent. Those of us who were born and brought up in London and know a great deal about it know that the Labour party prospered for some time in Tower Hamlets only by making promises to people.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) has talked about the phenomenon in 1949 and I should like to talk about it 30 years after that. The phenomenon was that of Labour councillors standing outside polling stations telling people to give them their vote and they would make sure that they got another flat. But they never had any intention of doing that or of keeping up the maintenance of the properties. That is why, in the end, those properties were taken away from them.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Like me, my hon. Friend has fought general elections in east London. Labour Members will not like it, but what he says is true. I have seen Labour councillors walking down streets and canvassing, and I have heard them say to people, "Who got you that flat? Be there next Thursday." That is corruption.

Mr. Hood: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: The hon. Member has just walked in, straight from the bar. He knows nothing about London, and I shall not give way.

This debate is about political control. Yesterday, my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning made an announcement about housing action trusts. Listening to what was said yesterday and what is being said today by Opposition Members would make one assume that the maintenance problems in the areas that have become subject to HATs are a result of what the Government have done, and the money that they have taken away. However, anyone who knew the Ocean estate or any of the areas that are being talked about during the 1970s knows that they were the pits then. They know that Tower Hamlets could not control them, and that the council did not even know what it owned. It left properties empty, it did not maintain the lifts, and the staircases were a disgrace and dangerous —and all that was in the Labour 1970s. It is the same now; that is why they need to be taken out of the control of Labour authorities which have deliberately kept people in poverty and badly maintained estates in order to maintain their political control.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: No, I have already given way quite a lot.

A particular problem has arisen in the London borough of Tower Hamlets, and it concerns those Bengali families who were declared to be intentionally homeless by the SLDP-dominated council. I am in somewhat of a quandary because I do not know whom to blame. Last week, I was talking to a Bengali gentleman in Spitalfields after a large meeting that I had addressed. Perhaps I should blame the Labour council, which left him, his family and another family in the same one flat since 1973, refusing to rehouse them. I do not know whether it is the well-known racialism of the Tower Hamlets Labour party, which goes back such a long way, that is to blame. Is it the SLDP council, which has taken the disgraceful step of treating people who are in this country legally and who are entitled to be here and who want to be rehoused as if they could be put back on boats? That is the SLDP in action, and I challenge the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) to distance himself from what the Tower Hamlets council has done.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The hon. Member knows my view. I disagree with, and disassociate myself from, that decision. However, on other housing matters, the council has made substantial progress and it believes that it could put much of the housing stock into good condition before the next borough elections.

Mr. Hughes: Those are the weasel and mealy-mouthed words that we hear from SLDP spokesmen all the time. The reality in Tower Hamlets is that 3,500 properties are empty. Organisations helping the homeless say that they could bring many of those properties back into use within weeks and use them to house local homeless families. The SLDP council is keeping people out of these houses. It is deliberately taking an attitude towards Bengali families that I can only describe as racist. That is the real gap between rich and poor, and it has not been caused by the Government. They are trying to do something about it with the HATs and allowing opting out under the provisions of the Housing Bill. The people who are responsible are those sitting on the Opposition Benches, and at least one word of apology would help.

Mrs. Rosie Barnes (Greenwich): The argument in the House today is not so much about whether there is inequality of opportunity in London as about who is responsible for it. I see this inequality every day in Greenwich. We have already heard many statistics, and I do not propose to add to them. I shall draw the attention of the House to some of the human consequences of this inequality.

Let us assume that all babies born in Greenwich today are born equal. However, by the time that they are only a few weeks old the inequality of opportunities that they face will be manifest. The first inequality that they will face comes when they go home. They go to estates such as Springfield Grove, Cherry Orchards, Mascalls Court and the Ferrier. Those are all pretty sounding names, but they are not pretty places in which to live. They are often damp, cold, miserable and concrete. They are overcrowded and subject to intolerable noise. Violence and crime are common, and dirt is just taken for granted.

I have heard a typical example of what happens, although the results of this example are rather more extreme than others. Earlier this year I received the following letter:

"Dear Rosie Barnes,

I am writing to you about the letter I got on the 3rd February. Does it mean that I am not going to get rehoused because I don't think I can take this place much more.

It is so cold and my children are so bad that they will not settle down now and not sleeping. I have been up day and night for a month. The flat is getting very bad now. Every time it rains or snows it comes in and my children are still not well."

I received a subsequent letter from that woman two or three months later, in which she said:

"Thank you for your letter you sent to me. I am writing to you to let you know that I have had my baby. I had him on the 4th March. He has got a cold allready and he is only 6 days old. So now I have three kids with colds."

I wrote to Greenwich council, and received a reply, which said:

"I refer to your enquiry . . . This family now have a total of 26 points which, as you know, is far below the level required for rehousing. As previously reported, no medical priority has been awarded to this family."

On 13 June, I received a letter from the same woman, who said:

"I am writing to let you know that I had my baby. He was born on the 4th March but he died on the 16th May."

That was not the first unexpected child death that I had been told about in my short time as Member of Parliament for Greenwich. It happens often to children who are taken home to these appalling estates. They have no chance, if they do not have a decent home, of growing up healthy and free from asthma and bronchitis. They should at least have a warm start in life. Warmth would be a step in the right direction.

Poverty is the next big battle that these families face. Housing benefit has been cut and the poll tax in Greenwich is expected to be £500 or £600 a year per person.

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Mr. Waldegrave): The hon Lady has rightly outlined a number of problems that poor families have to face. Another problem is racism, which we have discussed in the debate. Both sides of the House will, I think, agree that to some extent this is a by-election debate. I should be interested to know the hon. Lady's view of her party's candidate in the by-election, who has been putting material through my letter box saying that the Notting Hill carnival, which I happen to enjoy, should be banned. Does she stand by that policy?

Mrs. Barnes: I stand by the policy that the candidate has set out, which is that the carnival should not continue unless it is made safe. I strongly deny any allegation of racism against the SDP candidate in the by-election. The fact that he has a black adopted daughter should go some way to allay the Minister's fears. That was an outrageous intervention.

Housing benefits and the poll tax will take their toll of the already limited income of poor families in Greenwich. Money for food and fuel bills will be even harder to find and the families and their health will suffer accordingly.

We have not been helped by some of the actions of the local council, including a rent increase in sheltered housing of £18 a week. For many elderly people who are not on full housing benefit, or on housing benefit at all, but are of limited means, that is an unacceptable increase, which will mean that their limited savings for their old age will have to go much further than they imagined.

I draw attention to the plight of families in London when they need hospital services. We have spoken about housing and poverty, and health is another major requirement for equality of opportunity. If the Health Service is not functioning when needed in a way that will restore health, there is no equality. I endorse may of the statistics on the closure of hospitals in London and the cut in the number of acute beds.

Let me illustrate what is happening in one of the two major district hospitals in my area by reading an extract from a letter that I received from a paediatrician. He said:

"In view of your interest in our Department I thought I would bring you up-to-date with our present problems. The downstairs ward at the Brook Hospital has been closed since shortly after the hurricane. This was initially as a result of an invasion of sewage flies from the overloaded Brook Hospital sewer. These have proved extremely difficult to eradicate. However, I was informed today that the ward now remains closed because the hospital cannot find enough domestic staff to open it. We therefore have to cram all our medical and surgical patients into the upstairs ward which makes life very cramped and possibly contravenes health and safety regulations.

In view of the high, and rapidly rising, rate of child abuse in Greenwich District . . . we have a requirement for 2 full time Social Workers in Paediatric Social Work at the Brook Hospital. One Social Worker recently left and it has proved impossible to replace her. I think that Social Workers have been put off applying for this post because of the risk of being embroiled in child abuse scandals . . .

The Medical Secretarial service at the Memorial Hospital has been radically curtailed. As a result I am still signing letters dictated in early January"— this letter is dated 15 March—

"and there are some letters which were dictated for Paediatric and Gynae Clinics in late December which have still not been typed."

The letter also stated:

"The whole of the Brook is a depressing and depressed area. For a while this year the children were given sandwiches for their evening meal. As you might imagine many of my patients would not accept strong cheddar cheese and Branston pickle sandwiches. Following a strong protest we have reinstituted cooked food for the children though I am not sure whether this applies to the rest of the hospital."

That is a bleak medical picture.

Much needs to be put right in Greenwich. Poor housing, poverty and the Health Service must be sorted out. There will be much argument about whose fault those problems are. I have no doubt that the people of Greenwich are suffering because of the combination of a harsh Tory regime towards alleviating poverty, of not allowing money to be spent on building new homes for those who desperately need them and on restoring dilapidated homes, and the ideological conviction of the hard Left council in Greenwich and its inflexible approach to the problems that ordinary people face daily.

People such as the lady who wrote to me about her baby and those going into the Brook hospital and receiving that sort of treatment do not care whose fault it is. They just want it put right. Such suffering can and should be alleviated. Some things could be done immediately. We could eliminate the 20 per cent. ceiling on reinvestment in housing. We should use the money from the sale of council houses to build new ones, which are desperately needed in south-east London. We should seriously consider allowing portable discounts for tenants who are trapped in those miserable council properties so that they can buy a decent home. That has been SDP policy for some time.

We should reconsider the poll tax and ask whether it is right to expect people to pay £500 or £600 a head when they have no means to pay that sort of money and never expected having to do so. A tax of that sort, which does not reflect people's ability to pay and comes out of the blue, is uncalled for.

We should invest more money in our National Health Service. It cannot exist on a shoestring budget. If we want our children to get better, we must do more than give them cheese and pickle sandwiches in sewage-fly-infested wards. That is a disgrace in modern London. The suffering and the excuses must stop. Action must be taken to resolve some of the problems with practical solutions.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): This has been a useful debate in which 15 of the 23 Labour Members of Parliament for London have been present in the Chamber at one time or another and at least four other Labour Members of Parliament have been trying to speak. Compare that with the Conservative party, which has been rooting around in the back streets of Westminster trying to dragoon its Members in.

Mr. Waldegrave: To put the matter properly on the record, does the hon. Gentleman agree that the 15 came in seriatim—one after the other? There were never more than four in the Chamber at a time.

Mr. Soley: We carry out our operation in waves. I make no excuses about that.

The real issue is the ideological commitment of the Government to the market economy. They believe that if everyone is allowed to do his own thing, without any thought for the community or society, everyone will be better off. That has been spelt out by Conservative Member after Conservative Member, but they forget that the market is already distorted. In April, the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced a Budget that gave millionaires a rise of about £430 a week, and the Secretary of State and the Minister introduced housing benefit cuts that took £10 and £20 a week from the lowest paid.

That is the moral crisis of the Conservative party. However many times they try to use North sea oil to bribe the voters of the south-east to maintain their majority, they cannot hide the fact—as the Churches have rightly pointed out—that the Conservative party is devoid of morality on such issues.

Interestingly, the market will not be allowed to rip in the south-east. There, if people build houses where they are wanted, all of a sudden 100 Conservative Members sign motions saying that there must be planning controls and that local authorities must be allowed to step in. To his credit, the Secretary of State says no. I think that it is a mistaken policy, but at least he is consistent in saying, "No, you must not." But 100 Tory Members are constantly saying, "No market in my back yard," because the market is too embarrassing.

The same philosophy justifies the rise for the millionaires: to encourage people who are well off to work they must be given more money, but those who are badly off must be given less money to encourage them to work. There is no consistency in their philosophy.

The Government are abolishing the Inner London education authority not because it is expensive to run—the Metropolitan police are three times as expensive and local authority social services are twice as expensive—but because ILEA, like the GLC and the metropolitan counties, is run by the Labour party, and they want to smash anything resembling local democracy that they cannot win in the normal democratic way.

When the Inner London education authority goes, nursery education, school meals and the adult education service will be squeezed in some boroughs. We know that that is true because in the Kensington by-election, the poor old Secretary of State for Education and Science was wheeled out to try to explain the bizarre figure of £122 per head for the poll tax in Kensington. When asked about education, he said that it would be cheaper to collect. Price Waterhouse has said that it will be more expensive. The Secretary of State for the Environment has issued figures showing that the poll tax will be more like £380 per head in Kensington. Let us have no more nonsense about this wicked and regressive tax imposed on the people of London.

As for jobs, the Minister said that the homeless do not exist any more. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) pointed out, the homeless do not apply for bed-and-breakfast accommodation because they no longer get in advance the money needed to pay the rents for which the landlords ask. The homeless do not exist—just like the jobless! I was mistaken in thinking that there were 3 million unemployed people. It is just a wicked rumour put about by 3 million people with nothing better to do all day. The homeless do not exist. We cannot really see those people who live in cardboard boxes. The doubling of the number of people who present themselves to local authorities as homeless is just a statistic. That is what the Government say.

I was fascinated to see the hon. Members for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) and for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) quietly take the comment of a Home Secretary who says that they are to blame for the crime wave. This group is a new scapegoat for the Government—perhaps not all that new, because the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) also blamed them. Teachers and parents are to blame, we are told. The Home Secretary has discovered another group to blame—broadcasters. Everyone is to blame, except the Government—yet under the Government the figures have been rising faster than under any previous Government and faster than in any other western European country.

More important, they have been rising when they should have been falling. The age range of those who commit crimes is falling. Normally, when that demographic change takes place, there is a decline in the crime rate. There has been a decline in some sectors, but in others —especially the deadly crimes of casual violence—there has been an increase. I sadly predict that that increase will continue. If people are driven into homelessness and their benefits are slashed in a way that breaks up communities, the crime rate will be pushed up.

As I have told the Government before, some aspects of crime have become dramatically worse under the Conservative Government. Of the many causes of crime, three of the most important aspects are consistency in parenting, love in parenting, or other relationships within a family, and the strength of the community. In all three the Government are guilty, by making it more difficult for families struggling to maintain themselves on the margins of survival to carry on building up family bonds. The phrase introduced by the right hon. Member for Chingford, "On your bike", sums it up—it means "Get on your bike, leave your family and look for work." When kids came to London, what accommodation did they find? The Government said that they would improve housing and free the market. As a result of freeing the market in London, more than half the lets are already outside Rent Act provisions and the private sector is drying up faster than it has done since this idea was last tried in 1957. What a disaster this is.

The Government pretend that unemployment is not a factor and say, "These are youngsters. They are not at work." The Government forget that a family which is only just managing to cope and has to face additional pressures —perhaps unemployment for the father or rent arrears for the family—can be expected to run into more difficulties. It is no good the Home Secretary blaming teachers like the hon. Members for Ealing, North and for Erith and Crayford—if they had taught me, it would have been enough to drive me to crime—or blaming broadcasters.

Even the Evening Standard is getting worried. It has been ranting and raving about crime while at the same time encouraging it by some of its articles, especially those on race aspects. The Evening Standard has editorials which show that it is worried. In floundering around in a desperate attempt to find a reason for our problems, that newspaper recognises that the breakdown in the community is one factor. The Government, in their attack on local authorities and communities, are bringing that about. That is why the crime rate will continue to increase.

[Mr. Soley]

I challenge the Minister to say what he would do about the four hospitals that will close in north-west London. The Westminster, the Westminster Children's, the St. Mary Abbots and the West London are all to be closed because the Government want the money to close a fifth hospital—St. Stephen's—and reopen it in three year's time. Riverside district health authority wants £25 million, or it will close those four hospitals and rebuild the other. I challenge the Minister to say what he or the Conservative candidate in Kensington would do about that. The answer is nothing, as everyone knows.

Mr. Waldegrave: I should like to put this firmly on the record. As the hon. Gentleman knows, these decisions, which are not yet final, involve the choice of building a new £100 million hospital at St. Stephen's. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that he does not want that hospital? It is important to know the answer.

Mr. Soley: I should love to see that new hospital but, more important, I do not believe that it is necessary to close four other hospitals to do so; nor does anyone else, including the medical staff and the district authority. That authority has clearly said that it cannot manage without the £25 million. That amount is a tiny percentage of the amount given in the Budget to millionaires. Where is the morality in that? Where is the morality in the Conservative party?

The Government say, "Let us do something about transport." They are to drive a dirty great west cross route through Kensington, which will blight homes on either side of it. The Government are doing that in the belief that somehow it will improve internal transport in London. Have they ever thought that perhaps we should give a little more support to the public transport system as one way of improving it?

We come to housing—the Government's big failure. Housing troubles people in Kensington perhaps more than anything else, other than the poll tax. There are 16,000 homes in multiple occupation in Kensington, all eligible for the van Hoogstratens of this world. Because the Minister cares about this matter, I hope that he will respond when he gets my letter asking him to meet two women who were driven out of their home by Mr. van Hoogstraten. One of them appeared in the television programme on him. Those women will tell the Minister, in ways that he does not seem to accept from me, why Mr. van Hoogstraten is able to succeed.

The Minister could help by saying that tenants of non-resident landlords in the private sector can pick a landlord. Was that not what the Government were talking about in the Housing Bill? Was there not supposed to be something about "pick a landlord"? The Government turned it into "pick a tenant". The Bill allows people in the private sector or in housing associations, which I support, to take over public property in the form of council properties. The Government have not allowed a person in the private sector to say, "I have a Mr. van Hoogstraten on my back. I want a different landlord." The Government could have given local authorities a power and, more important, a duty to ensure that they had a tenants relations officer to check up on such properties and take action. We must remember that people cannot necessarily get legal aid for such cases, but the Government do not provide for all that. To them, it does not matter.

Buying a house? Forget it in London. One cannot buy a house in London any more unless one is earning a very good salary—well in excess of £20,000 per annum. Where is a person supposed to get a mortgage for houses and flats that cost more than £100,000? Where is a person supposed to rent when the market is well over £100 a week in most areas—one of the lowest estimates I have been able to get. The Conservative candidate in Kensington is offering a flat in Kensington for £500 a week. One must apply to the economic adviser in The Economist who is none other than the Conservative candidate for Kensington. It is £500 a week, so presumably he knows——

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): He is executive editor.

Mr. Soley: I thank the hon. Gentleman. So one has to apply to him for that flat at £500 a week. Do Conservative Members really believe that ordinary Londoners can afford that? Could a bus driver or a teacher afford it, or others who are desperately in need?

The Government tell us about empty properties. We have heard all about housing action trusts. One can have anything one likes except a vote. One is not allowed to vote just in case one does not vote in favour. The Government say that they want to deal with empty properties. The Minister ducked the question when I challenged him yesterday. He said that there are not many empty Government-owned Ministry of Defence properties in London. Actually, there are quite a few.

But it is not just that Department that we are concerned with—what about properties owned by the Home Office, London Regional Transport or the Department of the Environment? There is a whole range of empty properties in the Government sector, which are not being mentioned. Some 6·9 per cent. of Government-owned properties are empty, compared with an average of 2·5 per cent. of local authority properties, 4·1 per cent. in the private sector and 3 per cent. in the housing association sector. What matters is bad management, whoever manages the property—local authorities, the Government, private owners and so on.

The Government are not doing anything about that. All that they are doing is driving a wedge between the people of London, which is reflected in the rest of the country—a wedge between rich and poor, black and white, old and young, male and female. That is why Ann Holmes will be the new Member for Kensington on Thursday.

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Mr. William Waldegrave): During the debate I was almost converted from my views on televising Parliament, because, if the debate had been televised, it would have been worth another 10,000 votes to us in the Kensington by-election. Never have I heard such sterile speeches as we had from the Opposition. As for the dying swan songs of the splintered centre, we had better pass them by in silence.

The tone was set by the speech by the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms. Abbott), who spoke in the inimitable accents of my late and much-lamented aunt, Joyce Grenfell. She gave a catalogue of the past gamut of Labour analysis. It was only with speeches by my hon. Friends the Members for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) and for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) that we began to grapple with the problems.

The saddest intervention was by the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock). The hon. Lady made an eloquent speech, in the course of which she said that nothing was the fault of Labour councils. Even the leader of her council, Dave Sullivan, knows that that is not true, as he says in the secret reports that leak out of that council all the time. He admits that, despite the great expenditure and politicisation of officers recently, criticised by the ombudsman, there has been no improvement in services.

Ms. Ruddock: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) had five minutes longer to speak than I shall have, so I shall give way to the hon. Lady, but to no one else.

Ms. Ruddock: Does the Minister accept that Lewisham borough council is willing and able to put its own house in order to deal with disrepair on its estates and that it is the Government who deny the council the money for that?

Mr. Waldegrave: Not on the objective evidence of looking at the competence of highly politicised housing departments, which went to the point of writing unsolicited letters to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), the Minister with responsibility for sport, criticising his political views. When the politicisation of officers has gone to that extent, can the hon. Lady be surprised that we begin to doubt the competence of such authorities?

Opposition Members will be astonished—the hon. Member for Hammersmith will not, because I suspect that he has had the same experience—to hear that when I meet Labour authorities in the midlands and the north of England, which I do regularly, their opening words are, "For goodness' sake, we are not like those Labour authorities in London. We understand your problems with them. We are different. We are good Labour authorities." They are anxious to put a gap between them—[HON. MEMBERS: "Name them."] I shall give Opposition Members some names. Let us take the Labour council in Blackburn, which was the most recent one to put that point to me clearly—and why not, because such a council is a different kettle of fish? Why are those councils so anxious to put as much space as possible between the London Labour party and themselves? They know that we are right in our criticisms of Labour in London.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) spoke about homelessness. The trouble is that the feebleness of the Opposition that we have had to face today makes it all to easy for us to pass over the fact that there are real problems in London. The right hon. Gentleman is right that there are problems, and many of my hon. Friends recognise that.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey should be careful in using the 30,000 registered homeless as if that were the permanent picture. That figure represents the annual acceptances, half of which go into permanent accommodation. We recognise the problem and that is why today we are giving the third set of additional allocations to several local authorities, to deal, above all, with the bed-and-breakfast problem. It is wrong that families should be in bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

I am happy to be able to tell the hon. Gentleman that there has been a steady reduction, which was repeated in the last quarter's figures, for those in bed-and-breakfast accommodation. I know that the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), who is an expert and is anxious about the problem, will welcome that fall. It is not the beginning of a total solution of all the problems, but to get those families out of bed-and-breakfast accommodation must be a high priority for all of us.

The Opposition did not convey a vision of how we should manage housing in London as a whole. In London, about one third of all the housing stock is social housing —council or housing association property. Do Opposition Members think that that is enough, too much, or too little? With a stock that size, if we cannot manage to meet the needs of those in real housing need, with one in three of all the dwellings in London in the social rented sector, it is the incompetence of those who are responsible for it to which we must look first.

The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mrs. Barnes) put forward a radical new proposal, which is relevant—that we should have transferable discounts so that there is better use of the stock. I know that she voted against the Housing Bill, so she might have missed it, but we are doing exactly that. That is what we must now do. We must get the housing to those who need it most. Equally important, we must make sure that in this great city we are not polarised between the very rich and the very poor. That is why the right to buy and home ownership in London are so vital.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Waldegrave: No, because I have only four minutes left.

The 120,000 families who are now home owners, having bought council property, or the 300,000 new home owners in London since 1979, represent a far more practical step towards building a city that is balanced in tenure than any of the rhetoric and nonsense that we have had from the Opposition today.

Opposition Members often say that the right to buy has caused a huge loss of new lets, which results in homelessness. It has not. I can give the House some new figures. During the period 1983-84 to 1986-87, which is a reasonable period on which to calculate, 4,650 potential new lettings were lost as a result of right-to-buy disposals, but that loss was far more than offset by the addition to the London council housing stock, leaving aside housing associations for the moment, of just under 26,000 houses. So it is a myth to say that the right to buy has contributed to homelessness in that way. A more careful analysis is needed if we are to proceed in the right direction.

The Labour authorities in London, which the hon. Member for Deptford so touchingly said were responsible for none of the problems, are in fact in possession of billions of pounds worth of public property of one type or another. It is their duty to use that money efficiently to meet the needs of the people of London. Some of their confrères in other parts of the country and, indeed, some in London, can achieve that. But while the London Labour party dominates those councils and while we have rent arrears of £30 million and the slowness of the lets in Southwark, the muddles and confusion in Tower Hamlets——

Mr. Simon Hughes: It is getting better.

Mr. Waldegrave: All right, but even the hon. Gentleman would not want to say that he was proud of that organisation. He distanced himself from it today in one important matter of policy which he and I have discussed a number of times, so he is not too proud of the Liberal organisation of Tower Hamlets.

Today we have had nothing but sterility from the Opposition. From the Government Benches we have had a number of excellent speeches which analysed the situation, looked to the future and rubbed the noses of Labour Members in some of the truths that they like to forget and that their colleagues throughout the country know to be one of the reasons why they lost the last election. It was London Labour areas, where we did better than anywhere else in the country, that helped us to power in the last election and will doubtless do so again in the next one.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 30 (Questions on amendments) and agreed to.

Mr. Speaker forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House congratulates the Government on those economic and social policies which have created conditions in London in which real incomes are rising; notes, with particular satisfaction, that between 1981 and 1985 the real incomes of the poorest rose faster than average; endorses the Government's policies to alleviate inner city deprivation in London through the programmes set out in Action for Cities, including economic regeneration through the encouragement of enterprise, employment and training, improved housing, through such programmes as estate action, the establishment of Housing Action Trusts and the extension of the role of housing associations, education and revitalising the urban environment.

Sport

7.13 pm

Mr. Denis Howell (Birmingham, Small Heath): I beg to move,

That this House condemns the failure of Government policies to provide for the requirements of British sport, including a genuine Sport For All policy which meets the needs of community-based sport and recreation; deplores Government intentions to privatise the management of local authority sports facilities, and the sale of school playing fields; regrets the reconstitution of the Sports Council, removing the democratic right of British sport to elect its own representatives; condemns the failure of the Government to deal with the problem of criminal hooliganism in society as a whole and the imposition of unacceptable club membership schemes which remove the civil rights of genuine football supporters and which force upon football clubs arrangements which are impracticable and expensive; and calls for the development of a strategy for sport which is coherent and meets the needs of the whole of British sport.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I remind the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment standing in the name of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Howell: The debate is about the social purpose of sport, which is being undermined by the Government at every turn. Sport ought to provide millions of our people with opportunities for enjoyment in their personal lives and with a sense of challenge and achievement, and there should be pleasure for us all in the triumphs of those who delight the nation with superb performances.

Sport should enrich the society in which we live, but the Prime Minister tells us that there is no such thing as society. She is now firmly in control of sports policy, so we must assume that she regards the role of sport in society as irrelevant. Alone of all nations, Britain offers not a penny piece to those seeking to attract here the great festivals of international sport—the Olympic games, the Commonwealth games and the world student games. Birmingham, Manchester, Edinburgh, Cardiff and Sheffield are all cash-limited or rate-capped and left to their own devices. That is very sad, because international sport has an enormous contribution to make to the multiracial society in which we live.

The debate takes place at a time when many of our national sports—football, cricket, rugby and tennis—are producing abysmal performances. We hope that the members of our summer Olympic team, to whom we send our best wishes, will have better fortune than their comrades in the winter Olympics.

The future of all British sport is to be found in school sport. It is there that the basic skills are taught and lifetime enthusiasms generated. Never has morale in school sport been in such a state of collapse. The Government's running conflict with the teaching profession is having disastrous results. Forced contracts in Scotland are decimating school sports and directed time in England and Wales is totally destroying their voluntary nature.

Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howell: Not yet, it is too early.

When the English Schools Football Association tells me that it fears for the future, the rot has certainly set in. Two weeks ago, I attended the annual schools' athletic championships in the west midlands. For the first time in the history of those championships, 40 per cent. of the entrants failed to turn up. Judges had to be recruited from the crowd and people were asked to judge the javelin or the shot because teachers were not there. I inquired about the reason for this terrible situation and was told by physical education teachers that they were being directed to do other things and chose to to do their own things at weekends.

Anybody who doubts the disastrous effect on school sports of the Government's policy should stop for a minute or two to consider the report of the Secondary Heads Association. It represents headmasters in 5,161 schools that are teaching 4,095,500 secondary school pupils. A survey by the Secondary Heads Association found that

"95 per cent. of all schools have witnessed a rapid decline in the number of team fixtures during the last two years.

70 per cent. of schools have inadequate playing fields and indoor facilities.

75 per cent. of pupils no longer have the opportunity to learn to swim."

That is an utter disgrace and a threat to public health as well as to the future of British swimming. The association found that

"40 per cent. of schools have inadequate facilities for dance and gymnastics.

So few schools employ groundsmen that nearly half of all playing fields (by Department of Education and Science criteria) are substandard."

There could hardly be a more damning indictment of a Government who are failing in their duty to produce future generations of British sports people as well as facilities for people who enjoy sport for their own pleasure.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): My right hon. Friend spoke about swimming. Does he agree that, following the recent tragedy in the North sea, it was established that one of the troubles was that many workers on the oil rig could not swim?

Mr. Howell: That is not within my personal knowledge, but I am happy to accept it. It is possibly the case. As I have given way to my hon. Friend, perhaps the hon. Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) wishes to intervene.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The right hon. Gentleman is very gracious, and I appreciate his giving way. I was about to pursue a theme that he was developing earlier in his speech, when he said that the fountainhead of all successful sport was in schools. Is that true of our successful golfers, such as Nick Faldo and Sandy Lyle or of our snooker player Steve Davis? Many of our most successful sportsmen have developed their skills with good coaching, outside the school system.

Mr. Howell: I cannot follow that irrelevant remark. It would be like following Nigel Mansell round the motor racing track—which has nothing to do with school sport, I concede.

I want to talk about the scandal of the sale of our educational sports grounds. The Central Council of Physical Recreation has done an excellent job in drawing our attention to the fact that the Department of the Environment's own land register shows that 5,000 acres of sports fields are up for sale at present. That area is equal to a city the size of Coventry, and it is a reflection on the Government that they have allowed that to happen.

School sport in London, after the abolition of the GLC and the proposed execution of ILEA, will be in a catastrophic position. In its last year, the GLC spent almost £40 million on sport and recreation in London. Neither the boroughs nor the Government have provided anything like that amount. In their amendment, the Government make some play of increasing the Sports Council's grant by 37 per cent. but they do not tell us that £5 million of that was provided to compensate for the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan counties, so it is a false figure. In 1981, the Sports Council grant was £19 million, of which £5 million went to the governing bodies; today the grant is £38 million, of which only £8 million goes to the governing bodies. Not only local authorities but the governing bodies of British sport are being crushed by Government policies.

ILEA is rate-capped and the effect on London is that ILEA is having to close down 12 school playing fields. That is an absolute disgrace. ILEA is also cutting swimming time for pupils and the number of teachers and instructors who train pupils in London schools.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): The Minister is to be condemned. He is a product of school sport, yet he preaches to the nation about what the Government will do with school playing fields. He is an utter disgrace.

Mr. Howell: I hope to reinforce my hon. Friend's judgment in the course of my remarks.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): The right hon Gentleman and other more senior hon. Members know of my interest in the subject and of my anxiety some years ago to promote a Bill—which the right hon. Gentleman supported—on the sale of playing fields.

The right hon. Gentleman spoke about ILEA. Is he certain that ILEA is determined to close those fields? Is it not rather that, after consultation with my hon. Friend the Minister, certain boroughs will take over those sports facilities, thanks to the Government's initiative?

Mr. Howell: I am coming to that point. By 1990, when ILEA goes, there will be a tremendous crisis because the playing fields will go to the London residuary body. It will have to dispose of the playing fields, at present used by children in inner-London areas, to the highest bidders. That is what has happened to the Lyceum theatre. I spent an hour this afternoon with ILEA, so I am sure of my facts.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Colin Moynihan): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howell: Yes, although I assume that the Minister will make a speech later.

Mr. Moynihan: All the playing fields to which the right hon. Gentleman referred would go to the London education authorities and not to the London residuary body. After April 1990, it will be for the London education authorities to decide whether the playing fields have educational value and therefore whether they will remain in the control of education authorities for use by local students.

Mr. Howell: That is a completely unsatisfactory reply. Will those arrangements apply to the playing fields that ILEA so thoughtfully purchased outside London for use by children from inside London? That was one of the central questions that I was about to ask the Minister. We need a reply. Perhaps he will tell us. I shall certainly give way again if he wishes.

Mr. Moynihan: In my speech.

Mr. Howell: Oh.

The London borough of Waltham Forest would like to buy Waltham Lodge but it cannot because of what is to happen in 1990. That is an example of the difficulties that authorities face.

Opposition Members wish to draw the Minister's attention to a number of priorities on sport in schools with which we expect him to deal tonight. First, as an absolute minimum, physical education time ought to occupy at least 10 per cent. of the school curriculum. Nothing like that is provided in many schools at the moment. Secondly, we want in-service training for PE teachers, especially in primary schools, which are badly served in terms of sport and recreation.

Thirdly, we need greater flexibility in planning and provision for sport in local authorities and local education authorities and we should like the massive capital receipts to be unlocked in the interests of the sporting needs of the British people. Fourthly, we need development officers for sport. Given all the problems associated with boredom in our society, the need for more development officers stares one in the face. Such officers could create new sporting opportunities and attract people into playing a positive role.

There should be no more sales of school playing fields and where such sell-offs are projected, we want an assessment of both their present use and the future needs of sport. Finally, we seek 100 per cent. discretionary, if not compulsory, rating relief for all sports clubs that serve the community.

Let us consider local authority sport. The Sports Council's recent strategy document is entitled "Sport in the Community: into the 90s". There is no hope of pursuing that strategy unless we allow local authorities to provide facilities for all their citizens. In my own city of Birmingham, there were 620,000 users of indoor leisure facilities last year and there were 3 million sessions of swimming. All that is now threatened by the proposed privatisation of management. It is the city council that has built the facilities and attracted people to them. [HON. MEMBERS: "He thinks this is funny."] This Minister thinks that everything is funny. Charm oozes from every pore, but action from nowhere; he is stultified.

The Minister's own constituency of Lewisham has 202,800 users of indoor facilities and 740,000 swimming sessions. We should take these issues to the people. We should ask the people of Lewisham, as well as the people of London in general, why, when a local authority—not always a Labour authority—has taken the initiative and had the courage to provide facilities, that authority should be undermined by its own Member of Parliament.

The consultation document has turned out to be a total disaster for the Minister. Last week, he told the House that he had had 348 replies and that he was putting them in the Library. We had a count today and discovered that only 211 of the replies are to be found in the Library. What has happened to all the others? Of the replies to his consultation document, our analysis shows that 95 per cent. representing local government Conservative, Labour, Liberal and every other hue regard the consultation document as a disaster and reject it. The responses have been overwhelmingly hostile to the Government.

The Minister says that he wants private enterprise to manage the facilities. There has been nothing to stop private enterprise building sports halls and swimming baths, had it wished to do so, but it has not. Faced with the opposition to policy mark 1, which was to privatise everything, the Government brought out policy mark 2, which was to privatise the management resources. That policy was manifest nonsense. After management had been privatised, local authorities would have been left to pay all the loan charges and insurance, to pay for the equipment and maintenance, and to subsidise sport for the unemployed, the handicapped and pensioners. No wonder the local authorities to a man rose up in opposition to that ridiculous policy.

Policy mark 3 is to privatise but to allow local authorities to decide the pricing policy and the philosophy. We need to know what that means. The Secretary of State for the Environment never attends sports debates or sports meetings. He has never been through a sports turnstile in his life. He is never seen at any sports ground. That is why he is the Cabinet Minister responsible for these matters. On 22 July 1987 he told us, in respect of his own legislation:

"The enabling power will . . . allow the level of fees and charges under existing, new or amended charging powers to be prescribed or varied."—[Official Report, 22 July 1987; Vol. 120, c. 277.]

How can the Minister say that local authorities can have their own pricing policy when his boss, the Secretary of State, says that he will prescribe what the pricing policy should be? It is a total contradiction.

The Minister must come clean and tell us: will local authorities have the power to prescribe charges for privatised management schemes, or is the Secretary of State's diktat to apply? The other day the Minister said:

"Where a council wishes . . . to subsidise its pricing policy, it is perfectly entitled to write that into the contractual arrangements."—[Official Report, 1 July 1988; Vol. 136, c. 650.]

If a council is free to fix the prices, why should it want to subsidise those prices? It makes no sense. It can only make sense if it means that the council can fix prices but if the Secretary of State disagrees, he will give a direction, and at that point the council would be free to subsidise if it wished to do so.

The privatisation of the management of local authority sports facilities will price thousands of young people out of sports facilities. They will be turned on to the streets to find their excitement in other ways. It will also mean that many sports facilities will become bastions of middle-class activity, as has happened, for example, with lawn tennis to its detriment. No sport can prosper and produce champions unless the base of the pyramid is large enough.

The Sports Council recognises the dangers. In briefing notes it says:

"the willingness of local authorities to build new facilities in the future is a matter of concern".

Of course it should be. No local authority in its right mind will build new sports facilities just to hand them over to private management. That is a reality of life which the Minister must accept.

The Minister has talked about joint schemes. He takes refuge in his statement about exemption for joint shemes provided in schools with local authority recreational support. In Birmingham, where we are doing this, it was after a great fight with entrenched interests. The problem is that although under the Education Act 1986, the Minister wants joint schemes between education and recreational departments, under his new proposal, school governors have a complete say. School governors and heads can decide whether joint schemes in schools will be open to the public. Therefore, we cannot find any comfort in what the Minister has told us about joint schemes. We would like to see more, but his own legislation precludes that.

One of the saddest features of the Government is the contempt in which they hold the democratic process. We see it time and again. Good people are removed from the Sports Council, the Countryside Commission and regional authorities. The test for the Prime Minister and for the Minister is: is he one of us? They do not ask themselves whether the person will make a contribution to society.

The Minister is applying that dictum to the Sports Council, which is par for the course for him. He has removed all regional chairmen of sports councils without consulting the House. He announced that, as he usually announces such things, by a written answer to a planted question so that he did not have to explain to the House why he was removing the right of the Central Council of Physical Recreation to elect the representatives of British sport whom it wants on the Sports Council. That is the essence of democracy and was a right first accorded by me after the White Paper in 1979, and followed by every Conservative Minister until the Parliamentary Under-Secretary. We want to know why he has decided to depart from the wisdom of all others who have held that office. We are entitled to an answer.

The Sports Council will have no representatives of local government or of British sport. I have heard just today that the one representative of the Football Trust, which the Minister tells us will help pay for his membership scheme, has had a letter from the Minister telling him that his services are no longer required. That is a disaster. That member has served only two of his three years as a representative of the Football Trust which is putting millions of pounds into community sport. No doubt the Minister will explain why he thinks that there should be no democracy in the Sports Council.

Mr. David Evans (Welwyn Hatfield): Can the right hon. Gentleman tell me one initiative taken by the five members who have just retired from the Sports Council?

Mr. Howell: If the hon. Gentleman means the nine chairmen of regional sports councils, I would regard it as inconceivable that those nine, covering the whole country, have never put forward any initiatives for sport.

Mr. Evans: Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House of one initiative taken by the CCPR members who retired on 30th June?

Mr. Howell: If the hon. Member will look at the history of those sports that the CCPR represents, he will find that it is responsible for the voluntary control of them all. Everything that has been achieved in voluntary sports has been the result of the initiatives that the CCPR members took as representatives of British sport.

We know why the Minister wants to move in the direction he does. For him, the game is up. In an unguarded moment, he wrote a letter to the Sports Council chairman in November 1987, in which he stated:

"The Sports Council is to become the executive arm of Government."

That is what he wrote. Like everything else, sport is now to be brought under the immediate control of No. 10 and the Minister. The consultation exercise showed that 95 per cent. of those involved did not wish to go along with the Government, but that comment by the Minister before the consultation process began proves beyond peradventure that it was an absolute sham and was never intended to influence the Government—and it has had no influence. It was a totalitarian concept. Ministers who treat Parliament, sport or local government with contempt do themselves no service, and any Minister who does all three simultaneously is beyond recall.

I turn to the subject of football club membership schemes, relating to one of the greatest problems facing our country. One of the other great problems this country faces is the presence of Conservatives on the Government Benches. Serious violence confronts our nation, and it is spreading throughout our cities and rural areas. It is also to be found on the beaches of Spain. Yet the Government have not yet begun to approach the problem rationally.

It is not just a problem for football, but one for society —although if one does not believe in society, it is unlikely that one will be able to cure the problem. Three times I have offered to join an all-party examination of this serious national problem. Three times that offer has been rejected. For the fourth time, I make that offer. This matter transcends party political considerations, but the Government are looking for scapegoats or alibies.

The giveaway occurs in the plan that the Minister put before the House. He said that football violence was such a serious problem that he had to impose a membership scheme on every football supporter because that was the only way of getting the problem under control. But he added that the scheme will not be introduced next year and will have to wait another 12 months; the nation is to be terrorised for a further 12 months.

Mr. John Carlisle: Nonsense. That is stupid.

Mr. Howell: The hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) says, "That is stupid," but if football violence really is a serious problem affecting everyone in the country, it should be seriously dealt with now, not in 12 months' time. That 12-month delay is one of the greatest derelictions of duty that I have ever encountered during my time in the House.

We all know that really it is an alibi, and I can tell the House the reason for it. It may be remembered that three years ago, the Prime Minister first sent for the Football Association chairman, and that the No. 10 propaganda machine was busy carrying the message that the Prime Minister was now in charge and that everything would soon be under control. In the three years that followed, disaster followed disaster. The Prime Minister and the Home Secretary have much to answer for, as do many others.

Football itself has co-operated in every way. The Minister looks abashed, and no doubt will tell the House why he stated before the European football championship that the Football Association could not have done more and that he was delighted and pleased that it had co-operated with the Government in every respect. Those were his comments, and that is what he told me. In March, I wrote to the Minister and, on behalf of the Opposition, expressed the gravest doubts that the measures taken by the Football Association and by the Minister would be successful in curtailing the situation in Germany. The Minister replied that he was totally satisfied with the association's arrangements for dealing with the potential problem. I can only tell the House and the country that that is what happened, and I will publish that correspondence if the Minister disputes what I have said.

It is not immediately clear to any of us why the problems in Frankfurt and Dusseldorf, disgraceful though they were, should justify a scheme covering all legitimate, law-abiding football supporters throughout the country. That was a panic reaction to a serious situation. The Minister's membership scheme is totally impracticable and it will not work.

One can imagine the scene one Wednesday night at one of our great football grounds for an FA Cup replay. Along comes a supporter in the darkness, tendering his gate money, and the old boy manning the turnstile is expected to study his identity card. The supporter arrives at the gate at 7.20 pm for the replay, pays his money and receives his change—and then he must produce a card. The gatekeeper, locked in his little compartment, will have to study the photograph on the identity card to make sure that it is correct.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): What is the point of it?

Mr. Howell: The Minister has said that the card must bear a photograph—I am not inventing all this.

The gatekeeper must then insert it into the machine. At that point, the gatekeeper might have to tell the supporter, "You can't come in." There may be another 300 people queuing behind him, yet the elderly gatekeeper will be looking through his grille saying, "Please go away." The whole thing is farcical. The gatekeeper will do what the police already do when there is likely to be trouble when supporters having no tickets arrive at all-ticket matches. Then the police say, "Open the gates and let them in."

Mr. Moynihan indicated dissent.

Mr. Howell: I may tell the Minister that if he has ever been to a football match, he can never have seen anything. One of the troubles about the identity scheme is that it has been imposed by people who have never gone through turnstiles in their lives. I was personally present at the match between West Bromwich Albion and Leeds last year when 200 supporters turned up without tickets. They threatened to cause mayhem in the area, and I do not blame the police for responding on that occasion by saying, "Open the gates and let them in." If the Minister blames the police, no doubt he will take up the matter with the Home Secretary. Perhaps he will tell us how he proposes to deal with the problem. I use it merely as an illustration of the practical difficulties posed to the man on the ground.

Mr. Andrew Hargreaves (Birmingham, Hall Green): What is the right hon. Gentleman's solution?

Mr. Howell: My solution is to deal with the problem of hooligans where it exists, not to create it./Interruption./ I am grateful for my hon. Friends' support, but I do not want to overdo my generosity with time. Let me draw my hon. Friends' attention to the cost and the total impractability of providing such a scheme. A club in Holland facing the same problem installed an expensive and sophisticated electronic device. It lasted one week. The so-called hooligans poured in sand, chewing gum and bent cards, which destroyed the system. Such a system can work only if there is a policeman at every turnstile——

[Mr. Howell]

Mr. John Carlisle: Rubbish.

Mr. Howell: No doubt the hon. Gentleman is going to tell us about Luton, but we are discussing a national membership scheme, not a localised one. I challenge the Minister to tell us whether he has examined the scheme and whether what I am saying is accurate. But I can assure him that it is accurate: the scheme simply did not work.

If we are to have a centralised computer system that will require a policeman at every turnstile, who will pay for the policemen? Will they be regarded as being inside the ground?

Mr. Moynihan: Yes.

Mr. Howell: That will impose a charge of many more thousands on the football clubs. I am glad that the Minister has made it clear that another tax is to be imposed on football clubs going about their legitimate business.

Let us examine the cost of all this. How many thousands of turnstiles are there in this country? I calculate that there might be 2,500 on any one Saturday, and I am told that the electronic devices might cost £1,000 a time. The Minister can tell us what calculations he has made, but the cost of a centralised computer will be enormous. If half the turnstiles are in operation for half the clubs playing at home on a Saturday afternoon, the cost of feeding in thousands of cards at precisely the same time between 2·45 pm and 3 o'clock will require a very costly computer. Moreover, the cost of using British Telecom lines back to the centralised computer may be as much as £5 a minute. We begin to see how the cost is mounting up. If I have got it wrong, no doubt the Minister will tell us the cost of policing and of the terminal, the computer and the photograph machine.

There are other substantial reasons why everyone, including Leicester university, is opposed to the scheme. It is an affront to civil liberties to say that no man shall take his relative of friend to a football match unless he is registered well ahead of time and has a membership card. I wonder whether the House realises that the only other instance in which it is forbidden to visit a recreational club without a membership card is attendance at a pornographic film. Lawful football supporters are being linked with viewers of pornographic films, and I fundamentally object to that on their behalf. [Laughter.] I think that my hon. Friends are enjoying my speech. I assure them that I have only two more points to raise, and that they will wish me to raise both of them.

First, there is nothing in the package to deal with the racist chanting that we hear in football grounds. I am not surprised by that. Nothing in the Government's approach to the South African question in sport gives us any confidence that they understand the important role of sport in society, particularly in a multiracial society.

We cannot conclude the debate without something being said about the proposal by certain clubs to disrupt the Football League. If sport is about responsibility to society, that must embrace football at all levels. We appreciate the need for our top clubs to be on equal terms with continental clubs and to have the resources to keep good players in this country, and that must be provided for in financial terms. We may well have to have some sort of premier league, but it must be within the existing league structure. No club can provide for itself unless it concerns itself with the health of every other club in the country. That is a question of morality, which clubs would be well advised to consider.

Let me add that, if the proposed premier league or anything like it makes no provision for promotion or relegation, the Government should be aware that they will be creating a cartel, and the Office of Fair Trading and the Monopolies and Mergers Commission may well become involved. The Independent Broadcasting Association should also consider whether its policy is in the national interest. On behalf of the Opposition, I have written to Lord Thomson that he must examine the proposals of independent television companies.

Where the Government are taking the action that we have long urged on them—on passport control, sensible attendance orders and stiffer sentences—we shall give them our support, but the truth is that their sports policy lies in tatters. That policy contains no strategy for sport in the community, or for dealing with the evils of hooliganism that the Government visit on football. The Government deserve the censure that we seek to impose on them tonight.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Colin Moynihan): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof,

"welcomes the Government's success in encouraging increased participation in sport and recreation and the opening of new facilities, stimulating private sector sponsorship and increasing grant-in-aid to the Sports Council by 37 per cent. in real terms since 1979-80, bringing forward proposals for competitive tendering to increase the efficient management of existing facilities, announcing proposals for restructuring the membership of the Sports Council to enable it to carry out its responsibilities more effectively, thus setting the scene for the structure and direction of sports policy for the 1990's, providing the police and the courts with comprehensive powers for tackling the problem of criminal hooliganism and in taking a firm lead in ensuring an integrated approach to vigorous law enforcement; and also welcomes the anti-hooligan measures announced following the Prime Minister's meeting on 6th July with the football authorities.".

I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell) for raising the subject of sport, and in particular the theme of sport for all. I am delighted that in doing so he has given me the opportunity to draw the curtain on the Opposition's favourite era, the 1970s, and to reveal how the Government have achieved more sport for all in the 1980s —and how we intend to keep up the momentum through the 1990s and beyond.

Perhaps Opposition Members have not noticed, or do not wish to notice, that since they left office the participation in sport and active recreation by people of all ages and incomes has increased significantly, and that local authorities' spending on sport and recreation has continued to grow.

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): Does the Minister not recognise that the great impact has been made by responsible local authorities, which seek to make leisure provision in their own areas? Will he pay tribute to their initiative?

Mr. Moynihan: I certainly pay tribute to the fact that local authorities' spending on sport and recreation has increased. I also pay tribute to the substantial increase in sponsorship. Last year another £40 million—that is as much as the Sports Council grant—was put into sport and recreation. Moreover, the level of grant aid to the Sports Council has increased far above the rate of inflation, and additional public spending on sport and recreation through other budgets, including those of the urban programme and the Manpower Services Commission, runs into millions of pounds a year.

Moreover—this is a key point—there has been a continuing and growing increase in sponsorship, not just at the top level, but sensibly packaged to assist the development of sports at grass roots, as well as recognising the importance to the marketing mix of companies—[Interruption.] I can give dozens of examples. Let me start with the Trustcard initiative in the world of rowing. It is not just at the top of rowing—[Interruption.] Opposition Members ask for examples and when I give one they ridicule it. They ridicule it because they know that it is right, not just for rowing, but throughout sport.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda) rose——

Mr. Moynihan: Other right hon. and hon. Members want an opportunity to speak.

Mr. Rogers rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I remind the House that this is a short debate and that many right hon. and hon. Members are seeking to take part. All the sedentary interventions and attempts to intervene are at the expensive of time and other hon. Members' speeches.

Mr. Moynihan: To be more specific, the Sports Council estimates that 23 million people now participate in sports, compared to 17 million 10 years ago—an increase of 6 million. We now have more than 1,000 swimming pools, more than 1,100 sports halls and 99 artificial pitches, compared to 30 five years ago. Local authority spending on sport and recreation was estimated by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy at £650 million in 1986-87, a substantial increase in real terms since 1979. The Sports Council's grant for the present financial year is £39 million, compared with £15 million in 1978-79, an increase in real terms of 37 per cent.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): Is the Minister prepared to congratulate my local authority, Ogwr, which is currently building a new swimming pool, even though it is threatened with rate capping because of its action? Will he ensure that it is not rate-capped?

Mr. Moynihan: I happily congratulate the hon. Gentleman's local authority if it has wisely recognised the importance of public provision for sport and recreation in the building of a new swimming pool. I have just given due credit to local authorities up and down the country for recognising the importance of providing adequate resources and facilities for the development of leisure.

On top of public provision, private sponsorship of sport from £60 million in 1980-81 to more than £160 million last year. The provision of sports facilities is certainly thriving. Our goal must be to maximise their use for wider participation and the development of excellence.

The introduction of competition into the management of local authority sport and leisure facilities will mean more value for money in the running of those services and more incentives for people to use them. The right hon. Member for Small Heath has still not grasped that point, despite my repeated attempts to help him to do so. He persists in misunderstanding. He also continues to ring the alarm bells over recreational land and playing fields in particular. There is no evidence that there has been a net loss when land that has gone out of recreational use is balanced against gains in provision.

I agree with the right hon. Gentleman and other Members who have taken part in sports debates that it is important that we know in detail the availability of recreational land and playing fields in Britain. Currently, that information is not known by the Government, the Sports Council or the Central Council of Physical Recreation. When my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) brought his Bill before the House he rightly pointed out the need to assess and identify in detail the availability of such land so that we can monitor and increase its use by specific targeting of resources to obtain greater participation. It is participation that we want first and foremost.

Mr. John Carlisle: The House will be grateful for the remarks that my hon. Friend has just made. Will he consider instituting some form of register so that all the Departments—including his own and the Department of Education and Science—and all interested parties know exactly what sporting playing fields are available, so that we can obtain an accurate figure of whether any are being lost?

Mr. Moynihan: I have aleady spoken to the Sports Council about the importance of collating all the information that is available. I believe that that is the best source of information, and it is important to ensure that we bring in as much knowledge as possible, not just about specific facilities, but about their use. I hope that the regional councils for sport and recreation can assist in identifying that information.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Moynihan: It is critical to make progress in order to give other hon. Members a chance to speak.

I shall respond on issues concerning the Sports Council and its membership, to which the right hon. Member for Small Heath devoted much attention. Membership of the council was one of the issues on which I invited comments in my open letter to the chairman on 19 November. Many of those who responded argued that the council as it then was, with 32 members, was too large and unwieldy to be effective. I have considered their responses—and the others—carefully in the light of the royal charter. I wrote to the chairman of the Central Council of Physical Recreation on the subject again on 13 June and I have considered his replies to me carefully.

It seems clear that the Sports Council will be better able to do the job provided for it by the royal charter with a significantly smaller membership than it has had. The primary aim of the Sports Council is to promote participation. It follows naturally that the pursuit of that aim will also enable us to identify, nurture and develop excellence in sport.

That excellence should be supported from schools to governing bodies by an effective structure geared to serving our promising sportsmen and women. The formation and development of an appropriate and effective structure to take British sport into the 1990s is the challenge faced by the Government, governing bodies, sportsmen and women and underpins the comprehensive review of sport which I am currently undertaking.

Neither grass roots participation nor excellence is furthered by having the Sports Council run by a board that is too big to operate effectively. Thirty-two members are too many. I intend, therefore, to reduce the membership to less than half the level that the council has had. It is my intention not to renew the membership of the seven members whose appointments ran out at the end of June and I have asked a number of other members to resign. I shall be looking to appoint a small number of new members in the next few weeks.

The right hon. Member for Small Heath spoke about the governing bodies of sport. He did not explain how the governing bodies, or anyone else involved in sport, are helped by having a Sports Council too big to carry out effectively the job required of it by the royal charter. Even with 32 members, the council was a long way from representing more than a small proportion of all governing bodies.

Like everyone else connected with sport, the governing bodies will benefit from a more effective Sports Council. It will be for the new council to decide just what its consultative arrangements are to be. I know that the chairman is keen to ensure that close consultation is maintained with the governing bodies. It is inconceivable that the Sports Council could operate without effective consultative arrangements with the governing bodies of sport.

Mr. Rogers rose——

Mr. Moynihan: The governing bodies will have a major role to play in the future operations of the Sports Council. They will be playing that role——

Mr. Rogers rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister has made it clear that he is not giving way. The hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) must not persist.

Mr. Moynihan: They will be playing that role on behalf of sportsmen and women. That is their job.

Mr. Rogers rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Did the hon. Gentleman not hear me? He must not persist in disregarding what I have said.

Mr. Moynihan: Their job and mine is to serve sportsmen and women. I make no secret of my belief that they would be better able to do that job if they encouraged active sportsmen and women to play a greater part in running the organisation.

I held a conference for sportsmen and women in May. It was the first conference of its kind in this country, possibly in Europe, and I was delighted by its success. More than 150 sports people came and many of them contributed a great deal. The conference more than confirmed my belief—I wish it would that of the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers)—that active sportsmen and women have a great deal to offer in the way that sport is run.

Some governing bodies already involve active sportspeople in their decision-making process. I wish that they all did. I hope that they all will.

Mr. Rogers rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The way in which we usually conduct our debates is to seek to rebut arguments with which we disagree in the course of debate by making speeches, not by sedentary interventions or seeking to intervene.

Mr. Moynihan: One of the aims of the review of sports policy that I am conducting will be to bring active sportsmen and women much more into the administration of sport, both in running governing bodies and in the development of national sporting policies as a whole. That is why Sebastian Coe, Clive Lloyd, Steve Ovett, Tessa Sanderson, Duncan Goodhew and Jeoff Thomson together make up over 40 per cent. of the membership of the three reviews that I have initiated in my first year of office—reviews on drug abuse in sport, on sport for the disabled, and on sport and recreation provision in the inner cities.

Top-level sport in particular has changed radically in this decade. The pressures, including from the media, financial incentives, commercial interest and the level of competition itself are often intense. Who better can we choose to reflect, consider and implement new approaches to sports policy and sports administration than those coaches and participants, active or recently retired, who are willing and able to help? We need gold medal support in administration and management if we are to expect gold medal performances on the fields of play. We must solve today's problems with today's people. I shall be talking to the Sports Council and other sporting organisations about how we achieve that goal.

I shall now deal with competitive tendering. It is a sign of the weakness of the Opposition's Front-Bench thinking and continued outdated dark age vision of sport that they have to resort to scaremongering about our proposals for competitive tendering. If I interpret their views correctly, they would much prefer to maintain the status quo in local authority sport and leisure facility management. They would duck competition in the provision of services off the track, while purporting to promote competition on the track. They would enshrine for posterity the right of the direct labour organisations to manage facilities, without incentives for efficiency, better marketing and greater use. Worse still, they continue to misunderstand the policy.

Mr. Lofthouse rose——

Mr. Moynihan: They talk in their motion of privatisation, failing to understand that competitive tendering offers in-house DLO management a competitive chance to continue in that role. Their motion is defective. On that issue alone it should be withdrawn.

If the Opposition are to be believed, our proposals will undermine that ideal state of affairs and result in the closure of facilities, a massive lock-out of disadvantaged groups and a mushrooming of cowboy private sector operators looking to make a fast buck.

Mr. Lofthouse rose——

Mr. Moynihan: That is absolute nonsense. In case some Members had not noticed, we are moving into the 1990s. We are not stuck in the 1970s. We need to bring the sport and leisure service up to date and give it a sound base from which to grow and prosper. I very much doubt that even one local authority or one sports organisation could put its hand on its heart and argue otherwise. Indeed, I understand that a survey, commissioned by the London borough of Greenwich, into consumer satisfaction with its sport and leisure service found that a majority of the residents did not use the publicly provided facilities, not because they did not want to take part in the activities offered, but because they wanted, and preferred, to use privately run facilities.

Mr. Lofthouse rose——

Mr. Moynihan: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman when I have clarified the Government's proposals.

The service found that public awareness of the services provided was low and that many within the borough's disadvantaged groups did not feel that the facilities had been provided for use by them.

In short, while the borough's provision may be good, there seems to be little effective marketing of its facilities, and the very groups within the community, about whom we have heard great concern, are not using the facilities. I am not sure where that leaves the right hon. Gentleman's case for no change to current management practices. Under competitive tendering the local authority would have to be more imaginative in its marketing if it was to compete successfully with private sector bids for contracts.

Our proposals for competitive tendering will bring forward the achievement of sport for all, in a way that has manifestly not been achieved under the current closed shop regime.

Mr. Rogers rose——

Mr. Moynihan: We are creating a market for management contracts, supported by effective controls vested in the local authorities. Where marketing exists, the consumer gets a better deal. Our proposals would yield a greater use of existing facilities by all groups within the community, through more effective management and marketing. At the same time, we have listened to, and taken very full account of, the main concerns expressed by local authorities and sports facility users. We are not proposing to allow the free market to control completely the pricing levels of facilities.

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield) rose——

Mr. Moynihan: If they so choose, local authorities can determine what charges will be made to all, or to particular groups of users. In other words, the control of pricing is written into the order. By the order I mean the proposals that will come before the House, which will deal specifically with this and a number of related issues for the management of public sector local authority sport and recreation facilities.

Mr. Lofthouse: I thank the Minister for giving way. Perhaps he is not aware of a major consideration affecting the northern part of the country. Many of the mining communities have famous rugby league teams, such as those in Castleford, Featherstone and Wakefield. Because the mining industry has run down, local authorities have had to purchase two of the grounds. Under the new policy, what will happen to those rugby league teams? Will the local authority have to put them out to private management, which could mean the death of the rugby league clubs? How will the policy affect the teams whose grounds are now owned by the local authority?

Mr. Moynihan: Many sporting facilities are owned by local authorities and run by clubs, not least Rugby League, Rugby Union and football clubs throughout the country. While those facilities are run by the clubs on local authority grounds, they will not be put out to private sector management or to competitive tendering. They will go out to competitive tendering only when employees of the council are running the sports facilities. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman raised that point and enabled me to clarify it.

Throughout the country many Rugby League and Rugby Union clubs manage themselves and the clubs run their own operations. I am glad to see that the hon. Gentleman is nodding in assent. If no employee of the local authority is running the club—we know of no Rugby Union or Rugby League club being run by a local authority, but I should be happy to learn of any—the club will not be put out to competitive tendering, because the management is already in the hands of the club.

Mr. Lofthouse: What will happen if the council has to purchase the ground and is assisting in maintaining it?

Mr. Moynihan: If the council purchases the facility, there is no intention of privatising it. We are talking specifically about competitive tendering for the management of facilities in council management and under direct labour organisation management, not about private sports clubs which occupy council-owned sports grounds.

Mr. Rogers: I thank the Minister for giving way. What would happen if a bowling club ran and operated a bowling green on a long lease from a local authority, but all the maintenance of the club and its grounds was carried out by the local authority?

Mr. Moynihan: The bowling green would continue to be managed by the bowling club. Any council facilities, such as mowing, would go out to competitive tendering under the order. [Interruption.] When Opposition Members get a clear and direct answer, they continue to misinterpret it.

Such things as pricing policy, facilities for disadvantaged groups, the timing of access to facilities and subsidies will continue to be dealt with by local authorities if they so wish. The order relates specifically to management contracts, which will leave a private sector management team with the opportunity of marketing facilities far more effectively, because every additional person that uses the facilities provides additional income for the management. That is sport for all personified.

Mr. Terry Lewis (Worsley) rose——

Mr. Moynihan: I have spoken enough on that issue on two occasions in the House. I am glad that Opposition Members agree with that, so I shall happily move on.

I have no doubt that in coming months, particularly during our consultations on the terms of the order to implement our proposals, we shall return to many of the issues that I have mentioned today. We shall bring forward a draft order that will go out to full consultation, and we shall debate the result of that consultation exercise on the draft order.

I now come to a subject that has little to do with sport, except for the harm that it does. I am referring to the hooliganism associated with football. The House will know that the Prime Minister and other Ministers met the football authorities last week to discuss the dreadful events in West Germany last week and the continuing problems of hooliganism in the last domestic season. We have made considerable progress since the agreement reached between the Government and the football authorities in February 1987; but the problem is still there, and we have to do more.

The Prime Minister told the football authorities of the action that the Government were taking. Considerable police resources have already been devoted to football, backed by restrictions on alcohol under the Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol) Act 1985 and new powers for the police and courts under the Public Order Act 1986. The police will intensify their efforts to deal with criminal behaviour. The Government are considering how better to enforce restrictions on the sale of alcohol in the vicinity of football grounds and ways of prohibiting convicted football hooligans from attending matches here and abroad.

The Prime Minister welcomed the decision of the FA to withdraw from the friendly international match arranged in Italy in November and to reconsider other such matches arranged for next year. We pressed the football authorities to establish a national membership scheme to control access to all Football League matches. I regret that the football authorities do not believe that such a scheme could be introduced on a voluntary basis. The Government will therefore bring forward proposals for legislation to give statutory backing to a national membership scheme. A working party under my chairmanship, consisting of representatives of the football authorities, the Government and the police, will begin work very soon to look at all the details, and to take account of the points that the right hon. Member for Small Heath has raised.

Mr. Denis Howell: Will this working party include any football supporters, such as the National Federation of Football Supporters, which I have always found very responsible and extremely helpful? It is very important to have on the working party people who watch football from the terraces.

Mr. Moynihan: The working party will have representatives from the Football Association and the Football League, who I hope are ardent supporters of football. As for taking advice from various bodies which represent football fans, we shall talk to both major bodies and consult them on their reactions to the detailed schemes that we are working up, but we will not talk only to them. We shall talk to a range of computer companies about card schemes. We will consider bringing forward as comprehensive and foolproof a scheme as possible to deter the ugliness of hooliganism within the ground.

It is no use saying that there are no problems in the ground. Everybody knows that there are problems inside as well as outside. From the first day of the season at Scarborough last year, to the last day inside the Chelsea ground, there were problems, and we must tackle them. The package of measures put in place in February 1987 must deter hooliganism inside grounds. We must also face the problems outside grounds, which were prominent in the domestic season and during the European championships.

The right hon. Member for Small Heath mentioned my support for the FA in its preparation inside grounds for the championships. I congratulated it. There was not one incident inside any of the three grounds in which our first round matches were played. The problems in West Germany occurred outside grounds. We are tackling that through UEFA and the Council of Ministers for Sport, where we are taking appropriate measures to tackle the problem. It is no use allowing potential hooligans to travel to grounds knowing that they can get in.

I have noted with deep regret the support that the right hon. Member for Small Heath gave the authorities in their view that, in case of there being problems outside grounds, we should let people in. We must stop that. A national membership scheme would stop that problem arising in the domestic season.

Mr. Denis Howell: The Minister said, when asked, that of the 2,500 league matches that were played last year, only eight caused him great difficulty. When I said that he had supported and congratulated the FA, I said that I had here his document mentioning the problem inside grounds, but a memorandum that he sent me is clearly designed to deal with people's activities outside grounds. The Minister ought to face the facts. Of course football clubs have a slight difficulty inside grounds, but the problem is outside grounds, in society, and that is where we have to tackle it.

Mr. Moynihan: I deeply regret that the right hon. Gentleman believes that problems such as those that occurred inside Scarborough are minor and are not a serious issue that needs tackling. It requires total commitment from the football authorities, the Government and the police to stamp out the problem of hooliganism wherever it occurs. That is why we are proposing measures for inside and outside grounds.

Although there were eight major incidents inside grounds, we must not ignore the fact that there were 6,000 arrests associated with football hooliganism inside and outside grounds in the domestic season last year. That is a serious problem of law and order and it is associated with our national game. It requires the complete determination of everyone who has the game at heart, to say nothing of law and order.

I regret that it is necessary for us to legislate for a national membership scheme, but there comes a time when it is the Government's duty to act to protect society from some elements in it. We must do that, however, as the measures taken so far have not worked as effetively as we would have liked.

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): Does my hon. Friend agree that a contributory factor to hooliganism on the terraces must be the behaviour of players on the field? Will he include among those whom he consults referees, managers and players' representatives to see whether we can re-establish rather more traditional standards of sportsmanship and behaviour on the field? People on the terraces often see dreadful behaviour on the field, and hear the foulest language and abuse of referees, which often sparks off bad behaviour on the terraces.

Mr. Moynihan: I agree that it is essential that our top sportsmen and women, whether in football or other games, should set an example. They are looked up to by many young people who enjoy sport, and if they see players ignoring or rejecting authority on the field of play, they naturally, although wrongly, follow that example. It is essential that a good example be set. I congratulate Liverpool football club on having the fewest bookings last season and on playing outstanding football. That should be more widely publicised. It is a credit to the game, and that example should be followed by other clubs. The FA should take tough disciplinary action over major incidents when professional fouls, which have become all too common recently, or other problems associated with bad behaviour on the pitch arise.

Mr. Lewis: Perhaps I might lower the temperature a little. Can the Minister explain how the card membership system will control the mayhem which sometimes occurs in the centre of Manchester when there is a full house game at Old Trafford or Maine road? That is the crux of the matter.

Mr. Moynihan: Uncharacteristically, the hon. Gentleman has not listened to what I said. There is a twin-track approach. We must tackle problems inside and outside grounds. With regard to the latter, we are reviewing exclusion orders, attendance orders and probation orders. We must have punishments that deter hooligans associated with football from behaving badly outside grounds.

Membership cards can exclude people convicted of football-related hooliganism from the ground. That should be a significant deterrent, as one of the recurring problems is that people gain access to a ground three months after receiving an exclusion order which may, for example, have been served just before the summer. They may have a shorter exclusion order, which is of no deterrent effect. That card can be used as a deterrent to stop people who have been convicted of hooligan-related offences going to a football ground of any of the 92 clubs, not only for a year or two, but I hope for much longer.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): Will my hon. Friend consult the football authorities and Ministers about the success that we have had in Scotland with the alcohol problem inside and outside grounds? Will he comment on my firm belief that unless we have custodial sentences for hooligans we shall never stamp out the problem, especially on the continent? Will he have discussions with Governments on the continent to explain that releasing hooligans the morning after a match and sending them home with a pat on the back does no good to anyone? Custodial sentences are the only way forward.

Mr Moynihan: I am glad that my hon. Friend echoes my firm belief that we need effective deterrents. It was clear that a number of people who were detained overnight in German police stations regarded that as a free bed for the night—they had nowhere else to stay and got into fights as a result. That is appalling. We must make sure that punishments fit the crime.

Two interesting points can be learned from my hon. Friend's comments about alcohol in Scotland. One is that there is strong policing there, and I support that, as I am sure all hon. Members do. The second is that the Scots started earlier with alcohol restrictions. Lessons are to be learned from both initiatives.

As for the membership scheme, I hope that hon. Members on both sides recognise that we must act, as the measures taken so far have not reached the level of service to football or deterrents in law and order that we need. Decent football supporters—the vast majority of those who go to football matches—are as frustrated as anyone by the continuing blight of hooliganism and violence that is ruining their game. Of course hooliganism and violence are not confined to football, but football provides a focus for the thugs to operate on. I believe that decent supporters will welcome a package of measures that offer some prospect of curbing the problem.

I want the interests of the game and of law and order to be served. I do not want for ever to be talking about police containing the problem, and at what cost. Clubs should be thriving businesses providing entertaining football with trouble-free crowds watching in comfort. We must have a more businesslike approach and greater professionalism throughout football. Club boardrooms must play their full part and the FA and the Football League must show imagination and leadership. I want our football clubs to be more a part of their communities.

Clubs and communities should benefit one another. I see future chairmen and directors being proud of the part that their clubs play in local communities. The first attraction and concern will be the game on Saturday, but we must get away from the idea that the ground is unused between match days and is left as an empty mausoluem. I want directors to think of themselves as running important sport and leisure assets. The football in the community project fits in well here, and I hope that it goes from strength to strength.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): What calculation has the hon. Gentleman made of the reduction in crowds —particularly for poorer clubs—that would result from the introduction of his scheme? What financial support does he suppose he will introduce to assist the clubs that are hit by his methods?

Mr. Moynihan: We can look at examples in English football now, not least at Luton, the club of which my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North is chairman. Initially there was a considerable drop in membership, but then the families started coming back to Luton and attendances went up.

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): Has the hon. Gentleman been there?

Mr. Moynihan: Yes, I have been there; yes, I have seen; yes, I have spoken to families at the turnstile, who will come only to home games and will not travel away. That is not surprising. There are no incidents in Luton. It is not a matter of "Fortress Luton", as it was before the full membership scheme banning away supporters was introduced.

The clubs should finance the scheme. I seriously believe that there are terrific commercial opportunities for the membership cards—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. I can hear only one hon. Member at a time. Mr. Moynihan.

Mr. Moynihan: I firmly believe that there will be substantial commercial benefits for sponsors who are associated with a national membership scheme that has such a large number of different supporters and therefore access to a large customer base.

Much of what I have described represents the beginning of our blueprint for the 1990s. Sport does not, and should not, stand detached from the rest of society in this country or elsewhere. It must be able to change, adapt, grow and prosper, just as other activities, such as business and trade, do. Its administration and organisation, of which the Sports Council is an important part, must be constantly under review. I have begun that process and I intend to continue with it for the sake of a healthy and prosperous sports structure that delivers benefits to all members of our community.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): I have to tell the Minister that I have never heard anything as daft in my life. One can kid some of the people some of the time, but not all the people all the time. The Minister kids no one with his proposals. They are shabby and will act against the people that so desperately need the facilities that local authorities provide.

The Minister can help clubs in the Football League by enabling them to get shot of the police charges that they have to stand. The Government did that in Wapping. Surely they can help to provide proper police control by paying these charges.

I must correct the Minister on one point. Nothing that the Government have done has increased the number of people who participate in sport. All the credit goes to local authorities for ensuring the existence of the facilities for people to use. The Government have not spent more money on funding sports facilities. They have reduced the rate support grant by one third since they came to office, and unfortunately leisure amenities have been hard hit. Local people have made up the difference in local authorities' spending.

People ask how to become a member of the Sports Council. Obviously, standing beside the Minister on a political platform helps.

A point about competitive tendering: we should compare like with like. If local authorities are to allow the private sector to come in, the Government must remove their shackles so that they can compete with the private sector. For instance, Metro Catering cannot move into the private sector because of Government restraints.

Private profits mean high prices. Kids from these areas will not be able to use the facilities. When I was a kid I learnt to swim in what was known as the brown waters, where we were unsupervised by adults and in danger. We could not afford to use the swimming baths in the centre of Doncaster—we could not afford the transport—so we went over the fields unsupervised. Many children have drowned through lack of supervision. The Minister should be concerned about depriving kids of supervised training, without which they may disappear to some canal water.

Mr. McCartney: My hon. Friend spoke about local authorities providing resources for sportsmen. A local authority is providing resources for Max Robertson, the Olympic hurdler and 400-metre British record holder. This Government, in the year of training for the Olympics, have taken away his benefit and his housing benefit because he is not available for work as he is training to represent Britain in the Olympics. That is the way the Government behave when a local authority provides free facilities so that someone can train for the Olympics.

Mr. Redmond: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. I am sure that the Minister will have to ask my hon. Friend for the name, so that that young lad can be adequately financed to carry out his training. That is known as putting one's money where one's mouth is.

The old Ardwick urban district council built a leisure centre which increased the number of children who were able to swim. The Doncaster metropolitan district has now spent £23 million building a sports and leisure complex to ensure that Doncaster has one of the best leisure facilities in the northern region. The Queen laid the foundation stone, and we were extremely proud of it. Doncaster raised the funds to build that centre by selling off council-owned land to build debt-free. Because debt charges affect prices, building something debt-free lowers its price.

The Minister is kidding people about the residuary bodies looking after the school and local authority land transferred to them. That is not happening. Residual bodies are selling land. They are flooding the market and lowering prices, but that is to the benefit of their friends and colleagues, who are able to buy.

One of the most—if not the most—deprived areas in the country is Mexborough. I do not see the private sector rushing in to build facilities for the people there. It was Doncaster council's intention, following the completion of the Doncaster leisure centre, to ensure that there were adequate facilities for the people of Mexborough to enjoy. They created much of the wealth of this country through their blood, sweat and misery working down the mines. They kept industry going, and they have the right to the facilities that the private sector will not provide but the local authority will. The Minister's proposals will hinder the progress of providing such facilities for the people of Mexborough.

8.42 pm

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond), who made a reasoned argument, which will no doubt be well listened to by my hon. Friend the Minister, as he has voiced the opposition to the Government's proposals felt in his part of the world. His speech was in a rather better temper than that of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell), who, characteristically, kept the House in suspense for over 50 minutes, being egged on by some of the yobbish tendency sitting on the Benches behind him. One got the impression that his speech was probably his swan song on this subject in the House.

There is no doubt, as my hon. Friend the Minister rightly pointed out, that the right hon. Gentleman is a man of the 1970s, with the policies and remedies of the 1970s. We are now into the 1980s and we have to face the reality of the situation. I am glad to see that the right hon. Member is now back in the Chamber. We need 1980s solutions to 1980s problems. That is why we were pleased to hear what may well be his last speech on the subject.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on his spirited defence of the Government's admirable record. He was too modest to mention the many other measures that he and he alone has taken—on the drug scene, to improve the lot of the disabled in sport, and within the inner cities. The concept of a Minister responsible for sport who is interested in sport and sportsmen and sportswomen, and who dearly loves those sports that he played and which he wishes to encourage others to play is welcome. My hon. Friend is a man of great calibre, and we are lucky to have him lead us in this debate.

My opinion is different from that of the right hon. Member for Small Heath. He always wants it both ways. He accused my hon. Friend of using the Sports Council as the "executive arm"—my hon. Friend has used that phrase —and accused the Government of not taking enough interest in sport, not spending enough money on it and of interfering with local authorities and their policies on sport. The right hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways.

Many hon. Members do not think that there should be a Minister responsible for sport—my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks), is one of them. In my early and rather green days in this place, I signed an early-day motion supporting that view. However, having a Minister of such calibre and having money to spend on sport puts a different complexion on the matter. The right hon. Member must decide whether or not he wants Government interference.

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield): Is it right that the Minister responsible for sport should treat sport as a social or economic problem? That was the impression that the Minister gave me tonight. Is it not time that Ministers decided to treat sport seriously, and set up a Select Committee on sport—as the hon. Gentleman rightly pointed out, sports involve millions of people—so that at last we can have a say, rather than having a Government who bring issues of sport to the Chamber only when problems occur with particular aspects of it?

Mr. Carlisle: The hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) will know that I share and support many of his views. I do not want to ruin his political career by saying that. Some attention should be given to his interesting idea for a Select Committee, an idea that has much support in his party, and on which he tabled an early-day motion. I am sympathetic to that idea, but he has misjudged the Government by saying that we regard sport purely on a social basis. As the right hon. Member for Small Heath said, sport is big business, and for that reason and that reason only, the hon. Gentleman's idea will commend itself to the House.

I admire the courage of my hon. Friend the Minister in taking a decision about the management of the Sports Council that could not have been easy. It was that the Sports Council had become too large and unwieldy—so large that its meetings could not take place in its headquarters and it had to hire rooms from the British Medical Association in its adjacent building. It is remarkable that it had grown into such a dinosaur that it was representing no one. My hon. Friend is right to bring into the Sports Council more active sportsmen and sportswomen who are involved, day to day, in both participation in, and, in some cases, the administration of, sport. The new, slimmed-down Sports Council will be of benefit to sport in general and to those associated with the work that the council does.

I fully support, as I have said publicly in the presence of Labour Members, the Government's intentions about competitive tendering. If everything in the garden were lovely, and every leisure facility and swimming pool run by a local authority were making a profit, there would be no need for the exercise that my hon. Friend the Minister is proposing. If a Labour Member could point to a local authority that is making a profit, for the value and benefit of its ratepayers, on a particular facility, and that has been joined by many others, I would give way to that hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Bearing in mind what my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) said, will the hon. Member tell the House why he believes that it is a sine qua non, especially of swimming pools, that they must make a profit before they can exist and be run by local authorities? Surely they are there to provide a service, especially for our young people.

Mr. Carlisle: I take the hon. Gentleman's point, but he must answer, as we all do, to the ratepayers in his borough as to whether that swimming pool is giving ratepayers full value for money.

Mr. Spearing: It takes them off the streets.

Mr. Carlisle: If the hon. Gentleman will listen, I shall answer his point. He is right to assume that in many cases swimming is a social and educational service. The Government do not dissent from that view, because they have written into the proposed legislation the fact that local authorities and education authorities can subsidise where necessary. Each borough council must ask itself whether that pool is being run to its maximum efficiency. There is nothing wrong in that question being asked and competitive tendering being invited to ensure that ratepayers obtain maximum value. Opposition Members do not like that, because they do not believe in value for money, but my constituents and ratepayers do.

Mr. David Evans: Is my hon. Friend aware that a swimming pool in Streatham has lost £750,000 in one year?

Mr. Carlisle: My hon. Friend will know that the list is endless. The difference is that the few pools that have taken on private management—although not all of them—have turned in a profit and are still providing a good service to those areas. The pools are full, or they would not be making a profit.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): The hon. Gentleman seems to be causing confusion where there is none. Any fool can make a profit. The district of my constituency has the biggest sports centre in Britain, with a throughput of 1·1 million people a year. It charges 90p for swimming. If it was handed over to Mecca, it could charge £1·90 and it would make a profit. Plenty of people would still use the pool and pay £1·90, but not those who live in the area. People will be drawn in from other areas, and excluded from using that pool will be those who cannot pay £1·90 for a swimming session. I know that it is not the way that things are done in Cape Town, but can the hon. Gentleman agree that there is a social concept, too? If all that we are talking about is profit, he wins the argument. If we are talking about any sort of social decency, he loses the argument.

Mr. Carlisle: The hon. Gentleman was either not listening to what I said or thought that I was speaking Afrikaans and did not understand. In response to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), I agreed that a form of social responsibility is contained in the proposals, in that the local authority can subsidise a facility. We hope that educational authorities will take the same initiative, but what is wrong with asking whether that pool is well managed? The proposals will provide great interest and a great opportunity to those who want to manage such facilities. They will introduce a new era of management into our pools and leisure facilities. At the same time, it will be of direct benefit to ratepayers and to those who wish to use the facilities.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): The pools and leisure centres are already managed by professional managers, who were appointed before a brick was laid to advise local authorities on how to obtain maximum benefit from their facilities. The managers that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned are already in place and will run the centres exactly as they do now.

Mr. Carlisle: The hon. Gentleman makes my point—all is not well. Is he happy to ask his ratepayers to continue the bad management of facilities for the sake of political dogma? Is it right to allow that position to exist and not to say to the ratepayers, "We believe in value for money."? My hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans) has given an example of a facility that is losing thousands of pounds, yet Opposition Members seem to be happy for that to continue. We believe that we should examine those facilities.

I fully support the principles that have been stated. The benefits will be enormous, not only to the local community but to the ratepayers. Facilities will improve. Many facilities are completely out of date and local authorities either do not have the cash or, perhaps because of Government policies, cannot put the money in. Local authorities can go to the private sector and obtain an injection of funds into those facilities. Where that has happened——

Mr. Denis Howell indicated dissent.

Mr. Carlisle: The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. I will take him to Richmond to show him the excellent facilities there. The pool is full all the time and the facility is making a profit.

The right hon. Member for Small Heath and the Minister mentioned playing fields. The right hon. Gentleman was right to point to the conclusion of the Central Council of Physical Recreation, which I believe came originally from the Secondary Heads Association, that many of our playing fields are inadequate and not in the condition that we would like. Many hon. Members will concede that that problem should be arrested.

The main problem is that we do not know what playing facilities we have. When I introduced the Sports Fields and Recreational Facilities Bill, I thought it remarkable that officials of the Department of the Environment and of the Department of Education and Science had no means of telling exactly how many playing fields there were, and whether they were sports facilities in schools, in factories or in the private or public sectors. It is time that we resolved that problem by introducing a register.

Before the right hon. Member for Small Heath basks in the pleasure and the honour that I am giving him for helping me to introduce that measure, I say to him that, although the motion talks about laying the blame at the Government's door, he and his hon. Friends should ask themselves whether their local authorities are guiltless. After directive 909 from the Department of Education and Science gave education authorities the ability to sell parts of playing fields as school rolls drop, many Labour authorities took that initiative and sold the fields.

> "Government intentions to privatise the management of local authority sports facilities, and the sale of school playing fields",

Is the right hon. Gentleman saying that, if a Labour Government came back to power, they would introduce legislation to stop the sale of playing fields? The right hon. Gentleman will understand, as do most rational people and organisations, including the National Playing Fields Association, that some fields will not be saved. I do not dispute that policy. The House, local authorities and sports council should know exactly how many playing fields exist and how many have been sold over the past few years.

One problem which has been in our minds over the past few weeks, months and—for those of us who have been Members somewhat longer—decades is the violence associated with football. The problem always seems to rear its head. Many Conservative Members share the concern of the right hon. Member for Small Heath about the membership scheme and its effect on democracy. He said that it was an affront to civil liberty. Undoubtedly, football is in crisis yet again. It has been in crisis almost since the right hon. Member for Small Heath entered Parliament. Just when we seem to be getting on top of the problem, it rears its head again—often because it is lit up by the media and sometimes because of a challenge in Europe, as occurred in the past month. The football authorities—league and association—must understand that patience is running out, not only in the House but among constituents. The majority of our constituents want peace and harmony in our towns on a Saturday afternoon. The Government have taken the decision to legislate on membership schemes extremely reluctantly. I think that they understand the great worry of Conservative Members about the liberty issue.

Dr. Godman: I am a supporter of Greenock Morton, which unfortunately was relegated from the premier league. Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that when he and the Minister speak about national membership schemes and the football authorities, they are referring to matters exclusively English? Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that this scheme will not apply to Scotland?

Mr. Carlisle: I note what the hon. Gentleman says. I sympathise with him in his dilemma and am sure that his team will bounce back if his enthusiasm is shared on the field next season. The proposals are restricted to the 92 English clubs and do not apply to Scotland.

I have represented Luton for nine years. Matters came to a head in the FA cup game with Millwall. My hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans) will explain this matter more fully if he catches your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker. The membership scheme in Luton has brought three things to our town. First, it has brought peace on a Saturday afternoon. For every football fan who goes to watch Luton play, four or five people go to Luton for other reasons—for example, to shop or see their family. We now have a peaceful town on a Saturday afternoon. We are grateful to the club for the membership scheme which it introduced.

Secondly, the scheme has brought responsibility. Those who go to the club are responsible citizens. If they were not responsible, they would not apply for a card in the first place. We are proud of that and of our membership of well over 20,000.

Thirdly, the scheme has brought pride in our town and our club. Luton has rightly been held up as the club that has tried to tackle the awful problem surrounding the game. The police—the few that appear—can now go home at half-time.

We should like a national membership scheme. We have always felt that the away scheme was inadequate. Every person who wants to go to a football match should be able to become a member, and I see nothing wrong with that. The right hon. Member for Small Heath talked rather mockingly about clubs. He knows full well that many football games are all-ticket matches. It is as though everyone is a member. A person cannot get into the club, even with the help of a little man behind the grill, without a ticket. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) is not here. He knows that it is almost impossible to get a ticket to get into Cardiff Arms park, but a ticket is needed to get in. However, people do not riot. If they have forged tickets or cannot get in, they accept it.

Some provision must be made before people go to a sporting fixture. The Government propose that those who want to go to a game must make provision for it. There is nothing wrong with having a national membership scheme. It could be financed through a central system. An enormous amount of money could be generated by the company which won the order to use a mailing list or which carried advertisements. My hon. Friend the Minister is right to say that the clubs should bear part of the brunt of the cost. It was a confused public who last week saw Paul Gascoigne sold to Tottenham Hotspur for £2 million while football clubs plead poverty and say that they cannot afford this type of scheme.

Mr. Wilson rose——

Mr. Carlisle: I have given way once already to the hon. Gentleman.

We must all take the responsibility, and I take the point about law and order in general. But at the same time the football authorities must realise that our patience and that of the British people is at an end. That is why my hon. Friend the Minister is right to introduce the scheme, which will receive massive support in the House and outside.

9.5 pm

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate. I congratulate the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell), who opened the debate on behalf of the Opposition. My hon. Friends and I will have little difficulty in following him into the Lobby in due course.

This has been a sharply political debate and in some respects it may herald the end of what I had perhaps rather ingenuously assumed to be a bipartisan or even a tri-partisan approach to sport. The Minister—I do not say this lightly—must take some responsibility for that. Although he may have become a good Minister for the Government, I regret to say that I believe that he has become a poor Minister for sport. I do not know how he conceives his responsibility, but, as one who actively participated in sport for many years, I conceive his responsibility as being to fight for sport, to extract every last penny that he can from the Government and to influence every policy of the Government so that sporting opportunity is increased and participation widened.

I regret to say that the Minister has been party to policies for sport that are more noted for their political consistency with Government doctrine than for their contribution to recreational opportunity or sporting excellence. Nothing exhibits that more eloquently than his attitude towards the Sports Council. He wants—quite legitimately—to involve more of those who have been recently active participants in international sport. There is nothing new in that. The right hon. Member for Small Heath did precisely that in 1965 when he had the good sense to allow his eye to fall on me and to invite me to become a member of the United Kingdom Sports Council when I was still engaged in active participation in international sport.

If, by including more of those who are either currently or recently active, the effect is to cause an exclusion from the Sports Council of the wide range of interests that make up sports in the United Kingdom, inevitably a council will be created that is out of touch in material respects and that lacks a proper balance of interest. It must be said that the council was established by royal charter to give it independence. To describe it, in a phrase that I suspect the Minister may come to regret, as the Government's executive arm, at best is constitutionally doubtful and at worst confirms the suspicion that the Minister sees it as no more than an adjunct of his own Department.

The Minister's attitude towards the issue of violence associated with football has already been the subject of considerable discussion in the debate. I shall not add to that, save to say that the Government's proposals assume that all football clubs are the same, that they have the same resources and the same pattern of spectator attendance; and, are prepared to contemplate that the proposals may have the effect of preventing casual attendance, which for many football clubs is an extremely important part of their income.

No doubt we can have an unproductive debate about whether football is the cause of violence or whether violence arises from other causes, but one cannot ignore the fact that there has been violence in Spain caused by British holidaymakers and that there is violence in otherwise previously quite peaceful rural areas. I suspect that if we find the causes of those outbursts of violence, we may find information that will assist us in dealing with the cause of violence associated with football.

What is the purpose of privatisation? If it is truly to make more efficient use of resources, who could possibly oppose it? But it must be said that local authority management of sports facilities is concerned with the achievement not simply of profit, but of social and sporting objectives, which may transcend the narrow issue of the precise terms or form of the management of a particular facility.

How will the pursuit of profit enable local authorities to achieve such objectives? Can the Minister guarantee that there will be no reduction in opening hours if facilities are privatised? Can he guarantee that there will be no increase in admission charges? Can he guarantee that minority interests will be properly protected in the use of such facilities? Can he guarantee that revenue saved will be available to be spent on new and additional facilities?

What will the Minister do if lower standards of maintenance become established which have long-term consequences that lead ultimately to greater costs? At the moment much of the private management of facilities is concentrated on facilities which have a tourist and leisure component. I want to know—and the House is entitled to know—how competitive tendering will help in the provision of facilities for high-level training for outstanding competitors.

The Minister and I both had the good fortune to participate in the Olympic games—he with rather more success than I, it has to be said. Each of us had the benefit of an education and attendance at universities where the quality of facilities was such as to allow us the opportunity to realise our full sporting potential. I remember the days when there was hardly a proper running track in the city of Glasgow. I remember the days when people used to train in public parks. Because they were not students of the university, they were excluded from those facilities.

The great upsurge in facilities which took place in the 1960s and 1970s was financed by the public purse with a public purpose in mind. Where does the Minister think that those extraordinary athletes who now form part of the United Kingdom team came from? Where does he think that the exuberant black athletes who are likely to win medals for us at the summer Olympic games came from? They came not from the cloisters of universities, but from the publicly provided facilities in the inner cities.

The Minister wants a programme for sport. I will give him one. First, exempt sporting bodies, including the British Olympic Association, from paying corporation tax, and £3·5 million will go back into British sport. Let us have nationwide mandatory rates relief for local sports clubs. Let us have tax relief to encourage sponsorship. The Minister referred to sponsorship. Let us encourage more of it by giving tax relief for that purpose. Let us remove VAT from subscriptions to clubs, at least for those under 21.

It is a pity that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury finds it necessary to leave the Chamber at this point.

As part of that programme, let us encourage the multiple use of publicly owned facilities, such as schools, which for too much of the week lie empty and unused. What are the Government going to do about that? Finally, let us stop Government interference in sport. Sportsmen and sports bodies know best how to manage their own affairs.

If the Minister would fight for that programme, he would have the support of the whole House, and certainly of all the sporting interests in the United Kingdom.

9.12 pm

Mr. David Evans (Welwyn, Hatfield): It is my belief that the success of sport is determined by those who are running it. I believe that we have not only a poor soccer side but a pretty awful cricket side as well, and I am not all that happy with our tennis players either.

About 20 years ago, the cricket authority abdicated its responsibility to young cricket players by producing wickets at county level that produced results. People loved to go and watch the Denis Comptons of this world score hundreds between start of play and lunchtime, but the wickets that were produced approximately 20 years ago had a serious effect on the game. That complete dedication to getting results in county matches was transferred to minor county cricket, then to club cricket, and then to school cricket. It was not necessary to prepare the wicket properly and we have now lost the art of preparing the wickets on which the game is played. Unfortunately, for over 20 years players have not been taught to bat properly and bowlers have only to run in and wait for the wicket to do the work. Our test side is the poor relation of all other test sides and that is the responsibility of the Test and County Cricket Board and not the responsibility of the Government or the House.

We have weak management in the TCCB and weak part-time selectors. We have seen England's opening batsman knock over his wicket when given out and we have seen the captain arguing with the umpire. I do not know why he was not sent home that evening. That is the sort of image being presented to our youngsters. We must ask the people who run cricket to resign so that we may get back to playing the game properly. If we do that, in 10 years we may produce a side capable of beating other nations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) said that the Lawn Tennis Association was run by a load of upper-class twits. Anyone who looks at our tennis players will sympathise with that view, because we have not produced a men's champion at Wimbledon for 52 years, or a ladies' champion for 12 years. We should ask the LTA where all the money is going and why we cannot produce a tennis star—not 10, but one.

Why do we not have a man in the top 100 players or a woman in the top 50? The reason is simple. It is that over the last 20 to 30 years, the coaching and facilities provided by the LTA, the governing body of British tennis, have not been sufficient. Stefan Edberg lives in London and was coached by an English coach who offered his services to our tennis players but who was told by the upper-class twits that he was not needed. That is a mirror of what has gone on in lawn tennis for the last 20 to 40 years.

The football authorities abdicated not last Thursday at the Prime Minister's meeting but in the mid-1960s, when they agreed with players who negotiated contracts that the game could not afford. That was when the trouble started. The manager of Leeds United said that it was not a game but a war. From that moment on, the game started to deteriorate and the number of supporters who went to enjoy the sport started to decrease. Because of the way that that team played, using every possible infringement within the law, the game started to decline. We saw the start of the professional foul, the taking of five yards along the touchline and the wasting of time with a minute to go. The offside tactic made the game boring, the crowd became frustrated and trouble broke out on the terraces.

Where is British football now? It is not in Europe and may not even be in the World Cup. We have lost half our supporters in 20 years, because gates have dropped from 40 million 18 million. In that time we have lost two thirds of the professionals and public perception is that football is the root of hooliganism and the breakdown of law and order in and around football grounds. Hon. Members have mentioned that.

Identity cards are about separating football fans, 99·99 per cent. of whom are very good supporters of th game. I want to see a national scheme for identity cards so that we can separate the criminal from the football fan. I am trying to get football off the hook.

Mr. Wilson: If 99·9 per cent. of football fans are decent people—we all agree with that—is it not approaching the matter from entirely the wrong end to introduce a draconian scheme to sort out the 0·1 per cent.? Would it not be better for the Government, who make a lot of noise about law and order, to pin down the 0·1 per cent. as they have so conspicuously failed to do over the past decade?

Mr. Evans: The hon. Gentleman has made a good point. I shall put my argument another way. Public perception is that football is the root of the problems in our cities. Football is made responsible for every breakdown in law and order in and around football grounds. Where there is no football ground, someone only has to put a scarf around his neck and say, "I am a football fan," for his crime to be hung round the neck of football.

It would protect the identity of football if it did not have every single crime committed in and around a football ground blamed on it. People say, "It wasn't Liverpool fans or football fans who were to blame at Heysel stadium." Nobody knows. We do not even know who is a football fan and who is not. A national identity card scheme would mean that if somebody misbehaved it would not be football's responsibility, but the responsibility of the Home Office and the police. It seems that it is being made football's responsibility at the moment, and that is wrong.

At Luton we had tremendous problems of violence. We introduced a membership scheme, and although it would not be suitable for football nationally, it has worked for Luton. It is proved beyond doubt that we have removed violence from the game at Luton. We have not had a single arrest inside or outside the ground for two seasons. We have brought families back into the ground and the Arndale centre does not have to close from 4.40 pm to 5.40 pm every other Saturday. There have been 34 arrests at away games and, lo and behold, not one of those arrested was a Luton member.

I said to the police, "Don't talk to Luton Town about those 34 arrests. They were not members of Luton Town Football club." The Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire police would agree that there has been no increase in violence or trouble in those counties on Saturday afternoons. When those yobboes, bullies and cowards realised that they would have to fill in an application form, they disappeared and their gangs broke up because Luton is no longer a place in which to meet to cause mayhem on a Saturday afternoon.

I am sure that the national identity scheme will be sponsored, that a lottery will be held and that up to 6 million people will pay £1 a year to join in the lottery. There will be a prize of £50,000 every Saturday for 20 Saturdays and the other £3 million or £4 million will go into football.

I have every hope that a national identity card scheme will make football look the game it is. It will bring families back into the clubs. It is the big clubs that are nervous of the national identity scheme, not the small clubs. The scheme will be their saviour because mum will suddenly allow dad to take his son to the football game. Few wives will allow their son or daughter to be taken to a football ground at the moment. We have to make the ground a place that is perceived by the family to be safe to go to on a Saturday afternoon.

The first two years of the scheme will be difficult, but in about seven years the 18 million attendances will have gone up to 30 million, we shall return to the heyday of football and people will be able to carry on their normal Saturday business. Twenty years ago, people were proud to own a house near a football ground and those days will return because the Minister has had the courage to face up to football's problems; and he will solve those problems in the process.

Mr. David Blunkett (Sheffield, Brightside): It would be helpful if the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans), as chairman of Luton football club, and the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) got their act together. We have the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield describing the All England Lawn Tennis Association as a bunch of upper-class twits for not making the performance of our tennis players more acceptable and competitive, although it makes a substantial profit and is not run by the local authority, and we have the hon. Member for Luton, North describing local authorities as incompetent because they do not make a profit.

As was said so ably by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell), it is clear that sport and recreation are not intended to make a profit. I do not know whether the Minister felt that he was more a croupier than a cox when he was involved in that activity. If he had been organising the first major Athenian games or the games at Olympus, I wonder whether they would have been sponsored by Dimitri. Perhaps we would have Dimitri putting a drachma a metre on how far someone would run. No wonder we have a marathon of 26 miles 100-odd yards. It was probably decided on how much someone could make in profit.

That is what is being said tonight; it is not so much the playing fields as the paying fields of Eton that have been described to us. It is nonsense because a profit will not be made by managing our sports and recreation facilities and our swimming pools privately. The Government know that. I should like Conservative Members to name more than half a dozen football clubs that make a profit. Football clubs are run by patronage. We have the patronage of us, the community, who deliberately sponsor and pay for the facilities that we want. That is our choice and that is true of every major sports facility and swimming pool. Private management does not produce a profit. It allows local authorities to put money in the pockets of others. That is what is happening.

The average subsidy—because that is what it is—to a swimming pool is £150,000-plus; for those attached to sports facilities it is over £200,000. In the so-called privatisation, the Minister proposes that we, the community, pay a sum of money to people to make a profit out of us using our sports facilities. It is nothing to do with them making the facility profitable. What they will do is make money for themselves. We should distinguish that clearly. It is not about involving people. In the 1980s we should be moving to user participation and community management, with people in the community, the users and the interest groups being involved in the management and direction of sports facilities.

The proposal is quite the opposite. It is that we hive off the sports facilities. The last resort of any management that has given up is privatisation. Those were the words of John Banham, now director general of the CBI, formerly director of the Audit Commission. He is right. It is about whether we give up running things democratically and efficiently on behalf of the community and handing them over to others to make money out of the needs of the community.

I have a particular interest in the debate because Sheffield is attempting to host the world student games in 1991. The same applies to Manchester's bid for the Olympic games. The Government have failed completely to give anything except lip service to assisting my city to host the games—an opportunity to put on a major international event to provide sports facilities of world class to ensure that people from this country do not have to go elsewhere for decent training facilities.

Far from being willing to give even one cent—I use the word "cent" deliberately rather than "penny" because we are moving entirely into the American era of sponsorship and making money out of sport—the Government are doing the opposite. Every measure announced by the Secretary of State since the games were awarded to Britain —in terms of restriction of capital, intervention to stop the partnership between the public and the private sector, and between a pluralistic approach and the interests of the community—has undermined the possibility of successfully staging those games. That is an indictment of a Government who preach that they are in favour of joint partnership between the private and the public sector, and that they are in favour of sport for all and in developing facilities, but who then take every step to make it impossible for a major local authority to stage the games.

If we are for sports development and for community involvement, we must debunk once and for all the accusation that Labour Members are living in the dark ages of the 1970s. I presume that what is meant by the dark ages are the times of genuine enthusiasm of men and women for the sport in which they are engaged. I refer also to the £40,000 or more that the Amateur Swimming Association itself contributes directly to facilities, and for the time that is given night after night, weekend after weekend, by people who care about what they are doing and who are themselves in partnership with the managers of sports facilities and swimming pools in making them a living community asset.

If that is what is meant by the dark ages, then presumably it was also the era before we suffered a 50 per cent. increase in crime, before the Heysel stadium disaster, and before there were the disgraceful scenes in West Germany. In trying to deal with what is happening outside football grounds by restricting access, we must recognise that it is a social malaise. It is a blight upon our country. It is a matter of fostering greed, self-interest, and thuggery —and then blaming others for an environment and a climate that has been created by the grab-all, money-all society that the Minister and his colleagues foster. That is what it is all about. It is about market forces and economic greed. It is about taking away social responsibility and community involvement and replacing it by the money box. That is what we are debating tonight. We are talking about trying to create——

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley) rose——

Mr. Blunkett: I shall give way only to those who have sat through this debate.

It seems to me that there is tonight a real divide, such as that described by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East. On one side are those who are committed to a healthy and fit society in which recreation and sport are available and accessible to all, and affordable to every member of the community, so that we may be proud as a community of the way in which we foster that involvement in creating a world that young people feel belongs to them, that they can own, and in which they can take part.

That is the difference between us. It is the difference between rattling the money box, going for profit, and believing that privatisation is the god of all, or believing that we move forward as a society in giving people responsibility and a sense of involvement, and in creating a healthy world in which young people feel that they can play a part. The difference between us is shown by our belief in accessible, affordable facilities that are actually ours.

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): This has been a fascinating debate, but is has been too short. I hope that the Minister with responsibility for sport will, when he winds up the debate, guarantee that he will fight for a full day's debate on the subject in Government time. Many of my hon. Friends wished to take part in the debate, but it became clear——

Mr. Michael: Will my hon. Friend note that several of my Welsh hon. Friends have been present for this debate, but the lack of time has prevented me, for instance, from making the stirring plea for help for Welsh sport that I wished to make? Will he note also that not one Welsh Conservative Back Bencher or one Welsh Office Minister has been present? Will he ask the Minister to take that into account as well?

Mr. Pendry: That is the only intervention that I shall allow, as the debate has been circumscribed as a result of interventions, but I want the Minister to realise that my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) speaks for many Opposition Members.

As the debate has progressed—I hope that the Minister is listening, because I notice that he did not listen very carefully to my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell)—it has become clear that Opposition Members are much more interested in sport, recreation and leisure for the mass of our people than are Conservative Members. The contributions from my hon. Friends the Members for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) and for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), and from the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North East (Mr. Campbell), demonstrate that Opposition Members follow the lead given by my right hon. Friend in his powerful introduction of the motion. We represent the sportspeople of this country.

Once more, a motion to debate sport has come from the Opposition. The last time that the Government instituted such a debate was in 1980. Although the Minister was not in the House at the time, he was on our side of the argument about the boycott of the Moscow Olympic games. I well remember how he supported me at the English-Speaking Union when we opposed the Prime Minister's stand on the issue.

As my right hon. Friend said, we are not discussing a peripheral issue. Whether or not the Minister recognises it, he presides over an important and fast-growing activity, which generates some £4·5 billion of consumer expenditure. He must accept that he has a great responsibility. Of course sport is big business, but for many of us it is much more important that it means a truly healthy society. That is what separates the parties on the issue.

As has become abundantly clear, the Government increasingly feel that commercialism is much more important than our belief that sport relates to the needs and aspirations of the community. It is true that the Minister is a genuine sportsman, and that causes us some difficulty. Many of us gave him the kind of baptism that every Minister would like on coming into office. My right hon. Friend warned me, and I must plead guilty to being one of those who welcomed him, saying that, after a crop of pretty awful Conservative Sports Ministers, here was a man who, possibly, would "stand tall" for sport. We now find that he is following the same line as the rest and not living up to our expectations.

We had serious hopes for the Minister. We wanted him to do well for sport in the Government, the House and the community. We wanted him to elevate sport, but he has let us all down. His press conferences in West Germany during the European championship were nothing short of a disgrace. He merely heightened the tension. When he should have been combating the problems, he mystified the German authorities and UEFA officials.

It is not enough for the Minister to say, as I am sure he does privately, that he has a philistine, unsporty boss, and that he does not mean half of what comes from his office. The fact is that we expect him to stand up and fight his corner.

One of the most disgraceful parliamentary actions of recent years was the Minister's handling of the Green Paper on compulsory competitive tendering for management in local authority sports facilities. After promising me, in a parliamentary answer on 24 January, that he would place all the consultees' replies in the Library, he did so 158 days later, at 10.55 am on 1 July, five minutes before making his statement to the House. That was prised from him only when the Leader of the House insisted that he come to the Dispatch Box. He would have answered a planted question on that day on this important issue, as he did on the restructuring of the Sports Council, which my right hon. Friend the Member for Small Heath rightly condemned.

The Minister's explanations are as woefully inadequate as his proposals. His statement on competitive tendering clearly echoes his master's voice. It is ideology, dogma and prejudice winning over common sense and reason. When we were eventually able to read the consultees' replies, it became obvious that the Minister had not wanted us to read them. There is widespread and hostile opposition to the proposals, even in the watered down form in which they appeared.

I shall quote from the replies of one or two local authorities. One said:

"The Council aims to encourage the use by young people, disadvantaged groups and those new to sport. The Council considers it to be important that these measures are not prejudiced by purely financial targets."

Another said:

"I should express my reservations about the applicability of contract control over privately-operated sports and leisure facilities."

Those quotations come from local authorities that consider themselves to be radical. They show that the local authorities are diametrically opposed to Thatcherite plans. They are respectively from the Royal borough of Kensington and Chelsea and the London borough of Wandsworth.

The Audit Commission, not known for its Left-wing tendencies, also replied to the Minister. It said:

"the benefits of cheap sports facilities may not simply accrue to the individuals using them directly. They may encourage a fitter, healthier and safer community, by teaching children to swim for example. Or they may, by encouraging 'at risk' groups off the streets, reduce vandalism and petty crime."

There were many other replies. The Bromley Gymnastic Association urged

"the Secretary of State to leave the supply and control of sports facilities in the hands of the local authorities".

One gentleman wrote:

"As a Conservative voter, I feel there is a danger of shifting too far towards private control . . . Whilst there are strong arguments in favour of 'privatising' . . . I have serious doubts that the private sector will do this to the satisfaction of anyone but themselves and urge you to reconsider your position".

Mr. John Carlisle rose——

Mr. Pendry: I shall not give way.

The borough of Lewisham, in the Minister's constituency, said:

"The recent report on the inner city produced by Lord Scarman following the Brixton riots stressed the value to the community of good quality, accessible sports and leisure opportunities. The Green Paper is at odds with this view."

As my mother said when she came to see my national service passing-out parade, "Our Tom was the only one in step."

The Minister was new to the House when we debated capital punishment in 1983. He went out to the people in his constituency and asked how he should vote. They told him to vote for hanging and he did. If he believes in vox populi, vox dei, why does he not believe in listening to his constituents on an issue of this sort?

My right hon. Friend the Member for Small Heath raised the important issue of sport and recreation in schools. I agree with what he said. The Minister must recognise the importance of our youngsters who wish to participate in sport in schools. The closure of physical education training colleges at Madeley, Dartington, Anstey, Bingley and Nonington, and the closure of physical education courses at colleges such as St. John's in York and a course at Dartford show that it is a problem when we consider the predicted bulge in numbers pssing through primary and middle schools.

As my right hon. Friend said, the Minister has to stand up and insist that 10 per cent. of the curriculum is devoted to sport. He should insist in a loud voice that the value of sport in schools should be recognised. It has been mentioned that the people whom we are applauding as heroes now did not come through the elitist system, but came through our school system. The Minister must answer that when he replies to the debate.

Mr. Rogers: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Pendry: No. I wish to get on. I have already given way to an hon. Member representing a Welsh constituency to put it on record that there is need for a better and longer debate on this matter.

I shall direct the rest of my speech to an issue that is fundamental to the nation—the way in which our national game will go from here. It is clear that the Government, and especially the Minister, do not understand football. It is not just because the Minister supports Charlton Athletic, which is not a bad team. One of his biggest blunders is the proposed legislation to introduce a national membership scheme for our football clubs based on the Luton Town scheme. The hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans) has a lot of power. If that scheme is to be emulated, we should examine it more closely.

When the scheme was introduced, we must remember that John Smith, the executive director of Luton Town, said that it was more to protect the away supporters from the Luton hooligan element. I do not believe that the chairman of Luton Town will disagree with that. As a result, Luton's thugs caused problems only when away from home. Since that time, Luton's average home league gate has fallen dramatically by about 27 per cent. to just 8,039.

Mr. David Evans: The number of home fans has gone up. The figure that the hon. Gentleman is quoting represents home fans. The away fans have not been in the ground.

Mr. Pendry: I checked the figures this morning with the Football League.

Mr. Moynihan: He is the chairman.

Mr. Pendry: The chairman is the author of the scheme, so of course he defends it. If the Minister keeps interrupting he will not have much time in which to wind up the debate, so he had better shut up. [Interruption.] I remind the House that we both boxed for Oxford, but I am a heavier guy.

The attendance figure that I have given is despite a successful season for Luton, with a cup win, three Wembley appearances, an FA cup semi-final and ninth place in the league. With that scheme in place, Luton should have the lowest police charges in the league, but instead they are halfway down the table.

Clearly, if the Luton scheme was imposed on football, many clubs would die.

Mr. David Evans rose——

Mr. Pendry: Many clubs do not have the lucrative sponsorship contracts or long cup runs, so the sad truth is that the Government do not understand the problem.

Almost 18 million spectators watched football last season—more than almost all other popular sports put together. During the past three seasons 7,000 league and cup games have been played and there was trouble in 0·8 per cent. of them. In total, 0·03 per cent. of those attending games were in trouble. There were 2,500 games last season, and there was trouble in eight grounds. Those figures show the scale of the problem. They also place it in a European context.

The disgraceful scenes in West Germany could not be ignored by Governments. The thugs who caused havoc in Stuttgart, Dusseldorf and Frankfurt were by no means only English. Hardly any English supporters attended the final, yet there were 80 arrests. The all-party football committee asked the Minister to convene a meeting of Sports Ministers from UEFA countries to discuss common problems and find common solutions. Instead, there was the summit, which relates not to European football but to our home clubs.

I want to give the Minister an opportunity to reply to some of those points. Clearly, he has been sucked into the Luton scheme, but if he will not listen to the football authorities, why will he not listen to the centre for football research at Leicester university, which his Department commissioned to look into membership schemes? It found that there would be no merit in introducing such a scheme. The Minister has to answer that finding.

I cannot go into many of the issues that I wished to explore, because of the lack of time, but the Minister must build on what has been done since Heysel. There is a success story in football and he must build on it. The 50 per cent. membership scheme introduced only one year ago has two more years to go. It has been pretty successful. We must build on such proposals.

The Minister, himself a sportsman, should recognise, even if his Secretary of State does not, that through sport people can experience life at its best—its peaks and troughs, elation and despondency. Sport is a massive influence, so let us harness it to the benefit of society, to give the young opportunities in life rather than to turn them towards boredom and lawlessness. We must ensure that moral and social moves, not the cheque book, define the parameters of sport. The challenges facing sport are constantly evolving. It is not just about sponsorship and television, but about youth unemployment, early retirement, inner-city decay and many other factors.

The Labour party recognises sport in that social context. We therefore hope that those who agree with us on this issue will join us in the Lobby, because the Government and the Minister have no answers to the problems that we pose.

9.51 pm

Mr. Moynihan: With the leave of the House, I should like to reply to the debate.

If a man hears only what he wants to hear and disregards the rest, then Opposition Members have pushed that truth to the limit. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) gave a list of areas in which the Government should interfere and then, at the end of his speech, said that we should stop Government involvement in sport. It is a bit rich for him to complain about an open letter in which the Government rightly say that they wish to assess the relationship between the Government and the Sports Council. That relationship should be questioned.

The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell) repeated the phrase "executive arm". That is a bit rich from a right hon. Member who, in 1965, when the Sports Council was established as an advisory body, was its chairman as the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science with responsibility for sport. He is critical of our assessing the relationship between the Sports Council and the Government and whether there should be executive power, and he is critical of our reviewing sports policy, but that is essential if we are to move away from the dark ages of the 1970s and develop a policy that is geared to serve the sportsmen and women of the 1990s.

I do not hesitate to face up to that challenge. We shall come back to the House and go to the country with a programme that is right for developing excellence and participation among the next generation of sportsmen and women.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) wanted a Government committed to a healthy and fit society and participation for all. We can do no better than examine the facts and what has happened in the past 10 years. There has been an increase of 6 million, from 17 million to 23 million, in the number of people who participate in sport. The average frequency of participation in sport in 1977 was once every three weeks. The hon. Gentleman should praise the fact that it is now once a fortnight and that more people from all groups are involved. [Laughter.] The hon. Gentleman laughs, but that is fact and he does not like it. Let him look at the financing of sport in this country. Opposition Members should listen——

Mr. Rogers: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Many Welsh and Scottish Members are here this evening. The Minister who is now responding on behalf of the Government and who opened on their behalf—I applaud his hard work—has no responsibility for Wales or Scotland.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): I have heard what the hon. Gentleman has to say; I remind him that it is not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Moynihan: Let all hon. Members look at the financial position of sport and recreation in this country. Every part has enjoyed a major increase in real terms—local authority spending, spending through the voluntary sectors of the Sports Aid Foundation and the Sports Aid Trust—and money going into the Sports Council. There has also been a substantial increase in sports sponsorship, which has risen from £60 million in 1980-81, to £128 million in 1985-86, to £146 million in 1986-87, to £164 million—with a £40 million increase in sponsorship of sport in the past year. That is a record to be proud of. We are encouraging companies in Scotland, Wales and England to ensure that we obtain more sponsorship of sport to develop tomorrow's talent, to back today's, and to ensure that we increase participation——

Mr. Wilson rose——

Mr. Moynihan: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) for raising the subject of disabled sport and the initiatives that have been taken in the past 12 months. The other initiatives, as he rightly pointed out, were on drug abuse in sport and on the inner cities. I hope that we shall have all-party agreement that it is essential to shift public opinion—especially the press—away from considering the outstanding perform-ances of our top sports men and women who have disabilities in the news pages to considering them in the sports pages, in which they should be granted recognition as outstanding sportsmen and women.

This is why I have embarked in the past 12 months on the 10-events initiative and the full review of sport and recreation for those with disabilities. It is essential to raise the profile of disabled sport. The initiative includes £100,000 for the Paralympics in Seoul. I hope that all hon. Members will wish our able-bodied and disabled sportsmen and women at the consecutive Olympiads at Seoul this autumn every success——

Mr. Wilson: Say something useful.

Mr. Moynihan: It is shameful that the hon. Gentleman should say that. It shows the importance that the Opposition attach to sport, and it is disgraceful and despicable.

I want to answer a number of important points about competitive tendering. The whole purpose of the competitive tendering regime is to yield better value for money from local authority expenditure, to seek more effective management of our facilities, to ensure that facilities are better marketed and to generate sensitivity to the needs of the community. Of course, the proposals recognise the concerns expressed by hon. Members on both sides about the continued use of facilities by disadvantaged groups and promising young sportsmen and women. That is why local authorities will retain their discretionary powers over pricing, opening hours and admission policies. They would, if they chose, use those powers in drawing up tender specifications and, if appropriate, continuing a level of subsidy.

With these powers remaining, the notion of facilities being taken over by profiteering private sector managers is a fallacy. Once the tender specification is drawn up, local authority employees will compete on equal terms with the private and voluntary sectors for the management contracts. That is why we are building on the success of the private sector management of Cromwell squash and snooker club in Alton town council, of the Romford ice rink in Havering, of the Kingfisher leisure pool, and the Hadleigh swimming pool in Babergh district council. There are many more examples, and when these measures are in place there will be more throughout the country.

I turn to the important issues of football in its positive context, and the problems of football hooliganism. It is essential that there is a twin-track policy and that we should address the problem outside and inside the grounds. Often, the two will require different measures and that is why we are considering how best to enforce restrictions on the sale of alcohol within the vicinity of football grounds. That is why we are reviewing exclusion orders, probation orders and attendance orders. That is why we are looking at stopping convicted football hooligans from attending matches here and abroad. We are not going to stop in committing ourselves absolutely to ensuring that we achieve a comprehensive package to fight football hooliganism here and abroad.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 30 (Questions on amendments) and agreed to.

MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the Government's success in encouraging increased participation in sport and recreation and the opening of new facilities, stimulating private sector sponsorship and increasing grant-in-aid to the Sports Council by 37 per cent. in real terms since 1979-80, bringing forward proposals for competitive tendering to increase the efficient management of existing facilities, announcing proposals for restructuring the membership of the Sports Council to enable it to carry out its responsibilities more effectively, thus setting the scene for the structure and direction of sports policy for the 1990s, providing the police and the courts with comprehensive powers for tackling the problem of criminal hooliganism and in taking a firm lead in ensuring an integrated approach to vigorous law enforcement; and also welcomes the anti-hooligan measures announced following the Prime Minister's meeting on 6th July with the football authorities.

Television Licences

10.14 pm

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): I beg to move,

That the Wireless Telegraphy (Broadcast Licence Charges and Exemption) (Amendment No. 2) Regulations 1988 (S.I., 1988, No. 899), dated 18th May 1988, a copy of which was laid before this House on 18th May, be revoked.

I hope very much that at the end of the debate hon. Members on both sides of the House will join us in the Lobby.

We know from the former Minister of State, Home Office, the right hon. and learned Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Waddington), that the Government wish that they could get rid of the concessionary television licence. In an intervention on 16 January 1987, the then Minister stated:

"what I said"—

he made it clear that that was in a letter to a pensioner in Preston—

"could not be reasonably defended was the 5p concession". That is what the then Minister with responsibility for those matters said at the time, although he was gracious enough to add, for the sake of clarity:

"and that as a matter of practical politics we could not get rid of it".—[Official Report, 16 January 1987; Vol. 108, c. 508.]

That thought was echoed by the Home Secretary himself when he was answering questions earlier this year. So there we have it. The Government's real intention with the concession is that they wish that they could get rid of it, but they do not believe that they could get away with it.

When the Government were defeated in the court over the qualification for a concessionary licence, they had a choice. They could have done what the Prime Minister is constantly urging all of us to do, and said, "Right, we shall accept the rule of law and abide by the court's decision." The Government chose not to do that. Instead, they seek to change the law to match their view. They have added, as a sop, private nursing homes and in the process upped the cost of the concession from 5p to £5 for each person in the places where the concessionary television licence operates.

Presumably, the £5 will now be the base from which the cost of the concessionary licence will be raised from time to time. That must follow. Having made the first increase since 1969 when it was introduced, the Government have now decided that an increase is long overdue and that, having made one increase they might just as well from time to time go on to make others. That must follow, too, or perhaps the Minister will give us an undertaking now, or when he makes his speech on how long the cost will remain at £5.

Through the regulations, the Government are making matters worse, not only by such a hefty jump in the cost but by extending the anomaly. I say that because we are now left with a group of elderly people living in a warden-controlled complex who have the concession, while their friends and neighbours of exactly the same age and in a similar financial position, but living independently across the road or even next door, do not have it. I defy the Minister or any other hon. Member to explain that to elderly people so that they will see the justice of it. It makes no sense at all to discriminate in that arbitrary manner. That is why Labour is pledged to phase out the television licence fee for all pensioner households. That is the pledge that I am pleased to repeat now.

Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): As the hon. Gentleman is hostile to the anomaly, will he say whether he is in favour of a television licence fee or of abolishing it in favour of those of us who may not want to watch the BBC? Why should we pay for it?

Mr. Corbett: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman has not been following with his customary care what I am trying to say, but let us hope that what I shall now say will make it clear. The point that I am making is that millions of pensioners do not understand how, by the mere accident of an address at which they happen to live, either they get the concession or they do not, when on all the other factors they stand absolutely four square with those who get the concession.

Mr. Taylor: Is the hon. Gentleman in favour of a licence fee?

Mr. Corbett: If the hon. Gentleman will stay with me, I will give him and the House the answer to that in a minute.

When the Government, on the back of the Kirkleess judgment, looked at this matter, that was the other choice that they had. They could have said that this was unfair across the whole range of pensioners and that they would take the opportunity to exempt all pensioners from payment of the television licence fee.

The right hon. and learned Member for Ribble Valley, on 16 January 1987, at column 508 of Hansard, described the whole of the concession as "absurd" and argued against its extension. Indeed, he said that he regretted that it could not be abolished.

Instead of tinkering around, why have the Government not done the sensible thing and extended the concession to all pensioner households, or, better still, abolished the licence fee for all pensioners?

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is my hon. Friend aware that the decision was taken in the High Court on 23 January, exactly one week after my private Member's Bill —which would have done precisely what my hon. Friend has suggested—was defeated by 21 votes? Is it not interesting that that decision in the High Court was not appealed against by the Government, and that instead they are bringing in this new scheme?

Mr. Corbett: The whole House owes my hon. Friend a debt for the persistence with which he has pursued his efforts for the extension of free television licences to pensioners. The hallmark of this Government, and classically, of course, of the Secretary of State for the Environment, is that, when they are taken to court and lose, they do not abide by that decision; they come here, use their majority to move the goal posts, and change the law.

Just in case the Minister and the House think that this revolutionary notion of exempting pensioner households from paying the television licence fee is the sole child of the Labour party, I want to remind them that the Peacock report, two years ago, at paragraph 634, recommended a step towards this, when it said that pensioners drawing supplementary benefit—as it was then—in households wholly dependent upon a pension should be exempt from the licence fee. To be fair, it went on to say that it did not accept the case for extending this to all pensioners. That did not meet Labour's aspirations, but it did recognise that 1·6 million pensioners living on means-tested benefits had special needs. I want to remind the House in particular what Peacock said would be the cost. It said that it would add about £5 at most to the cost of a licence for the rest of us.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): A few months ago the hon. Gentleman was urging that the licence fee should be abolished for all pensioners. Would that not cost something like £360 million a year, which is equivalent to a 50 per cent. increase for all those who still have to pay the licence fee, including those on low incomes?

Mr. Corbett: No, it would not. I am happy to say that the latest calculation is that it would cost £287 million—but do not let us fall out over the difference, whatever it is. There are other ways of doing that, If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me for a moment, I shall come to them. I anticipated all the questions that I was going to be asked.

The Government argue that abolishing the television licence fee for pensioners would give help to many who do not need it. Of course, in that sense so does the concessionary bus pass. The Prime Minister and her husband are entitled to bus passes, and I have heard no one say that they should not get them, like other pensioners, even though there are about 13 television sets in No. 10 Downing street for which no licence fee is paid.

The Government say that there is no way of knowing where the pensioner households are. That is tommy-rot, as my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) will quickly confirm. Perhaps the poll tax will at last unwittingly serve some sort of useful, though expensive, purpose by making it possible for the state to know exactly who lives where and how old they are.

This compassionate Government say that if they exempt pensioners, even pensioners who are on some form of means-tested benefit, what about other people on low incomes—the jobless, single parents, the sick and disabled and those on low pay? We know about the Government's concern for such people. The social security changes in April have made millions of them worse off. Again, the poll tax register would identify such people.

The Government argue that exempting pensioners would mean that taxes would have to go up. No such thing follows. I remind the House that Peacock said that exemptions for the 1·6 million pensioners then on means-tested benefits would add no more than £5 to the cost of the licence for the rest of us. Of course, we could claw back just a few of the thousands of millions of pounds handed to the already rich in this year's Budget and those that preceded it in the last nine years. The Government's arguments will not wash. They are indifferent to the real hardships faced by millions of pensioners, and, given the political will, the abolition of the licence fee is an extra and avoidable expense.

I beg the House to understand that for millions of pensioners television is a necessity and not the luxury or optional extra that it may be for some of us with more money. In most Opposition Members' constituencies there are hundreds of thousands of lonely, isolated pensioners living behind locked and chained front doors. To those people television is not simply a friend but often their only friend.

Of course I accept, as do we all, that regular contact within their communities is one answer to the loneliness of such people, but such contact is immensely difficult to achieve. Elderly people often resent well-intentioned neighbours popping in. They value their independence, although they often pay a high price for it. For millions of elderly people living alone and for elderly couples, television is a necessity. We know that most people rely mainly on television as a source of information about what is going on, and that is especially true of the elderly. It can help elderly people to play an active part in our democracy, and freedom from the licence fee can help in that process.

The television licence fee hits elderly people especially hard because, although it is good value, it represents a higher proportion of the income of pensioners than of the income of those of us who are at work, the principle seemingly being that the less one has the more one pays in percentage terms.

The Government's reluctance to help pensioners in this way is all the more difficult to understand amid all their boasts about eight years of sustained economic growth and the Prime Minister telling us that living standards are at their highest ever levels. They are for some, but not for millions of pensioners who have been left out of these riches. Why cannot the Government spare a few crumbs from the table for the elderly? What they have given away to the already rich in tax cuts would pay for exempting all pensioners from the TV licence fee seven times over. The value of those tax cuts is 78 times the cost of even the present restricted concessions.

My right hon. and hon. Friends and I regard this as a matter of justice. Justice demands that pensioners have both the right and the means to live in decency and dignity. If the Government deny them that right again tonight, the Labour party will give it to them after the next election.

10.30 pm

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): I have a good deal of sympathy for my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, who is faced with a concessionary television licence scheme that he would not necessarily have wished to inherit. I do not believe that he wants to abolish it, but I suspect that he would have preferred it to be in a different form when it reached his hands.

As we know, the scheme applies to people in sheltered housing who are of retirement age or who are physically disabled or mentally disordered. At present it does not cover nursing homes and is confined to premises provided by local authorities or housing associations. It does not cover privately run sheltered accommodation, of which I suspect there was very little when the scheme was first devised.

Inevitably, the scheme has its anomalies. In particular, as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) said, it does not cover pensioners who live in their own homes, although it seems to me quite impracticable and unreasonable to suggest that it should. After all, many pensioners living in their own homes are well-to-do and can easily afford the full charge for the televison licence. Many homes have several wage packets coming in and only one pensioner; how simple it would be to take the concessionary television licence out in the name of that one pensioner. It would also be enormously expensive for ordinary licence holders if the concessionary scheme were extended to all pensioners.

The Government are right to extend the scheme to nursing homes and to suggest that the sum of 5p, which has remained unchanged for years while the licence fee has increased in line with inflation, should be fixed at the more realistic figure of £5. Nevertheless, the scheme is still confined to sheltered housing run by local authorities and housing associations. Many sheltered housing schemes are privately run, and there are a number in my constituency. It is now proposed to extend the scheme to private nursing homes but not to private sheltered accommodation.

The circumstances of people in privately run accommodation are often similar to those of people in local authority accommodation. Some of them are on social security, but they still do not get the concession. In some cases housing associations have taken over the management of private sheltered schemes and as I understand it, the residents of such homes will get the concessions, whereas those in homes remaining in private hands will not. Often it is pure chance that determines whether elderly people needing sheltered accommodation finish up in accommodation provided by local authorities, by housing associations or by private oganisations.

I have urged my hon. Friend the Minister of State in parliamentary questions and in correspondence to remedy the anomaly by extending the concessionary scheme to private accommodation. He has failed to do so and he has not justified his failure. In a letter dated 22 June he wrote: "the original intention of the scheme . . . was to benefit pensioners and disabled people living in residential homes, or in equivalent sheltered housing provided by a local authority or a housing association. We did consider whether it would be right to extend the scheme to private sheltered housing, but we concluded that this would not be justified.."

I have to ask my hon. Friend: why not? The only grounds that I can think of would be those of cost, but this is already met in part at least by increasing the fee to £5, which will increase substantially the revenue from concessionary licences. If it did not cover the cost of extension to private schemes, I would take no exception to the fee being £6, which would still be a modest figure compared with the full charge for a licence. Although the regulations remedy one injustice, they perpetuate another. As it is not possible to amend a statutory instrument, I find myself unable to support the regulations as they stand.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I am pleased that the hon. Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) will be joining us in the Division Lobby.

Mr. Sims indicated dissent.

Mr. Winnick: He shakes his head. At least he will be abstaining, I hope.

The new regulations ensure that it will be much more difficult for pensioners to receive a concessionary licence, which is to cost £5 instead of 5p. Although I agree with what my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) said, if all pensioners paid £5 we would have no quarrel.

The background to this deplorable decision by the Government was the High Court case which, as I said in my intervention, was one week after my private Member's Bill was defeated by 21 votes. The High Court ruled that Kirklees council was right and the Home Office was wrong. Kirklees said that pensioners who were visited by a warden should be entitled to the concessionary licence fee. The High Court agreed, as long as the pensioners lived in accommodation designated for retired people. The Home Office did not appeal against the High Court decision. It is interesting to note that, in his judgment, Mr. Justice Taylor said:

"The standpoint taken by the respondent"—

that was the Home Office—

"is perverse and one which no reasonable Home Secretary could adopt."

Following that decision on 23 January last year, a number of local authorities, Labour-controlled in the main, which wished to assist pensioners in their areas, made applications on the same basis as the High Court had ruled. That is, the local authorities made application where there was a common facility. In the case of Kirklees, it was the visiting warden.

In my own borough it was the "piper" warning system, which is a first-class facility for pensioners. They press a button if they are in difficulty and the warning goes through to a department in the town hall. It is a common facility. So long as the pensioners are in accommodation designated for pensioners, it was accepted by the television licence office in Bristol that the applications should succeed. Therefore, the regulations have to be seen against the background of the Kirklees application being successful. The Government have responded disgracefully. The whole purpose of the new rules is to make it as difficult as possible for pensioners to qualify for the concession.

The week before the High Court decision, I introduced a private Member's Bill that would have exempted all pensioners from the payment of the licence fee. Why was that Bill defeated by 21 votes? The explanation is simple. The payroll vote came out in force. The Daily Star called the No Division list a list of dishonour. Among those voting against was the Secretary of State for Education, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Minister for Local Government, who is responsible for the poll tax, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, the Minister of State, Foreign Office, the Secretary of State for Social Services, his deputy for health matters, the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Secretary of State for Scotland.

The hon. Member for Hove (Mr. Sainsbury), who could himself virtually subsidise the pensioners' licence fee, voted against, as did the Government Chief Whip, the Leader of the House, the former chairman of the Conservative party, the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), and the Secretary of State for Employment —all people earning substantial salaries and all——

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for an hon. Member to read names from a Division List relating to a vote which took place some time ago?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): This is a short debate and I have heard nothing out of order so far.

Mr. Winnick: I will not read further names from what was indeed a roll of dishonour. Those who voted against on that occasion were, as I said, earning substantial salaries, over £40,000, from their Government jobs. They voted to deprive pensioners living on very limited incomes of concessionary television licences.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Winnick: No.

Mr. King rose——

Hon. Members: Sit down. [Interruption.]

Mr. Winnick: The more interruptions I have from Conservative Members, the less time they will have to speak.

I am in favour of the BBC having a licence fee, and I regard it as good value for money. Indeed, any alternative to the licence system—for example, subscription television—would be wrong and would make life more difficult for those on low incomes.

Television plays an important role in the lives of the elderly, particularly the very old, especially those with few relatives or close friends, and especially during the winter months. The Peacock report pointed out that many pensioners were dependent on television for information and entertainment. One third of pensioner households are on what is now income support, and many more are just above that level.

Ms. Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): Would my hon. Friend agree that the least the Government should do would be to introduce concessionary licences for all pensioners, particularly in view of the fact that since 1979, when they ended the link between pensions and earnings, they have taken £1,249 from the single pensioner?

Mr. Winnick: That is right, and that was the purpose of my Bill, which was defeated by Government pressure and the payroll vote. In the main, pensioners deeply resent having to pay the full licence fee. While Conservative Members criticise us over this issue, many of their pensioner constituents, like ours, want the fee reduced because of their limited incomes, and they and we will continue to campaign until that happens.

The Peacock report recommended that pensioners on what is now income support, then supplementary benefit, should pay a concessionary fee. I said on Second Reading of my Bill that if the Government were not prepared to accept my argument, I would meet them halfway as a first step on the road to achieving justice for pensioners. But the Minister who replied—he is now at the Foreign Office—said that in no circumstances would the Government bend their view. Now they are making it far more difficult for pensioners to receive the concession.

The Government have argued—no doubt the point will be made again tonight—that the cost would be substantial, but this is a year that has seen massive tax cuts for the wealthiest in the community. Not only the hon. Member for Hove but many others will receive hundreds, in some cases thousands, of pounds more each week as a result. A third of pensioners rely on income support, and I am informed by the Library that around 64 per cent. are on small incomes and certainly substantially below average incomes. Why should they be denied what they have argued and campaigned for year after year? No Conservative Member will argue that the pensioner's bus pass is wrong and unjust and should be withdrawn.

Mr. Greg Knight rose——

Mr. Winnick: If the hon. Gentleman is one Conservative Member who believes that the bus pass is wrong, he can tell his constituents so.

Mr. Knight rose——

Mr. Winnick: No, I will not give way.

If it is right for pensioners to receive the bus pass, why should they not receive the television licence fee concession? Why should they have to pay what we pay out of our incomes? That is both illogical and unjust.

I know that, because of the Government's majority, we shall lose the vote and these squalid, miserable regulations will be passed. Of that none of us has the shadow of a doubt. But anyone who believes that the issue will die a natural death is living in a fool's paradise. There are millions of pensioners in this country, and they are determined people: they fought for the bus pass. This shows my age, I suppose, but I well remember the campaigns which were directed at local authorities—I was a member of one—and against the Tory Government of the time, and which finally resulted in the introduction of the pass.

I have no doubt that pensioners will eventually get the concessionary television licence, but I know that it will not come from the present Government. A Government who have given massive increases to the rich in the Budget, and who are always willing to act for the most prosperous in the community, have introduced a measure that removes the opportunity for more pensioners to receive a concession. Everyone who votes against our prayer should be thoroughly ashamed. We have every justification for voting against the Government.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): After listening to the speech made by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), I feel—as, no doubt, will most of my colleagues—that Harold Wilson was more than generous when he once described him as the silliest man in the House. If the hon. Gentleman had taken the time and trouble to study his own rhetoric and his private Member's Bill, he would know that only 162 Labour Members bothered to turn up to support him that afternoon. Where were the rest?

Mr. Winnick: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. First, nothing in the Library suggests that Harold Wilson was ever foolish enough to describe me in such an absurd fashion. That is a lie. No such remark was ever made about me. I want to put that right, because it has been mentioned before.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is a matter for debate, not a point of order for the Chair. Mr. King.

Mr. King rose——

Mr. Winnick: Further to my point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) said that I introduced a ten-minute Bill. I——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has made his speech. Having resumed his place, he must allow other hon. Members to contribute to the debate. Mr. King.

Mr. King: The silliness of the——

Mr. Winnick: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your advice.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Everything that the hon. Gentleman has said so far amounts to a point of debate, not a point of order. If the hon. Gentleman has a point of order for the Chair, he must come to it immediately.

Mr. Winnick: Certainly, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Gentleman said that I introduced a ten-minute Bill on the date to which I referred. I ask that it be placed on the record that it was a private Member's Bill—I won a place in the Ballot—and not a ten-minute Bill. That is my point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. King.

Mr. King: I concede that it was a private Member's Bill. It was silly, however, to read out a list of Conservative Members who voted against the Bill, when only 162 Labour Members bothered to support it. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) was not a supporter, nor was the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett). Where was the hon. Gentleman's support? The fact is that it was not present in this place. It was defeated by a small number on a Division.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (Derbyshire, West): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the reasons why the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) could not support the Bill brought in by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) was that he, the right hon. Gentleman, was a member of the Labour Government who took away the Christmas bonus for pensioners? He may have felt guilty about supporting the Bill when he had supported the removal of the bonus from pensioners.

Mr. King rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) will not be tempted to go down that road.

Mr. King: I do not intend to do so, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin) for reminding us of the lack of generosity on occasion of Labour Members when they are in government.

I understand that the regulations will increase the 5p television licence fee for those who are in warden-controlled accommodation. For some years many people have claimed that 5p was far too small a sum. They argued that the difference between the full licence fee and 5p was an enormous anomaly. I could not object to the 5p fee being increased to £5, but perhaps we should consider a two-tier system, which would mean that all old age pensioners in receipt of the basic state benefit would pay a reduced fee of £30, for example. That would be far more acceptable.

We are paying money to the BBC to bring us television and radio services, which are available in considerable quantity. The cost to the consumer is about 16p a day for two television channels, four national radio stations and many local radio stations. When we bear in mind that the cost of the average newspaper is about 25p, the television licence fee is a bargain. But is the idea of a television licence fee right and proper nowadays? I believe that there is no need for such a licence. It is time that the BBC was placed on a more commercial footing. The elderly and everyone else should have the option to buy a television set that receives commercial channels only. If someone does not want the BBC services, he should be able to buy a television set that will receive the commercial channels only.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): Does my hon. Friend agree that in a short time satellite television broadcasting will make that option available to the consumer? It will mean that it will be possible to subscribe to individual channels. If pensioners prove that they are pensioners, the cost will be reduced for them. Is that not the future? If hon. Members ask how or why, I can suggest two British colonies which receive extremely good satellite broadcasts —the Turks and Caicos islands and Bermuda. If hon. Members want to learn about satellite broadcasting, they should go to those islands.

Mr. King: I shall do the debate a service by pointing out that fully commercial television operations enable consumers to choose whether to take those services. We definitely should encourage that.

Returning to the principle of a television licence, we should examine much more carefully how the BBC spends its money, because that is reflected in the cost of the licence.

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. King: No. I wish to get on because other hon. Members wish to speak in this very short debate.

Millions of pounds are being gambled by the media on allocating television time for soccer coverage. I understand that many pensioners do not watch soccer on television, yet their licence money is helping to provide those services.

Mr. Grocott rose——

Mr. King: We are told that if we were to introduce advertising to reduce the level of the licence fee on the BBC, the editorial content would be altered as a result of demands on the BBC to respond to the whims of the market place by down-marketing its programmes.

Mr. Grocott: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that he is advocating a subscription to the BBC, and that if pensioners want to watch the Cup final, the Grand national or Test match cricket, under his system they will have to pay for those services provided by the BBC? Will he confirm that that is his view and tell us how much he estimates they will have to pay?

Mr. King: I am not sure that I advocated that. I said that if pensioners wished to buy a television set that was adapted to receive only commercial television, and not the BBC, they could watch the programmes and not pay a licence fee. Those who wanted to watch BBC programmes would have to pay a licence fee, which we have at the moment and which we are discussing tonight. I believe that if we allowed sponsorship for sporting programmes on the BBC, the licence fee could be reduced dramatically, if not wiped out altogether.

We are told that there are not enough advertisers to use the BBC services. It is considered that if more commercial channels and more sponsorship were announced, there would be a dearth of advertisers. Of course that is not so.

Our commercial systems are extremely expensive to advertisers—the most expensive in Europe—because they have a monopoly within the United Kingdom. By encouraging more competition, particularly in sponsored programmes, we can reduce the cost of the licence fee. Why should soccer not be sponsored by Barclays bank, or motor racing by Shell?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We cannot have a wide-ranging debate on what is likely to happen in future. Incidental references are in order, but the hon. Gentleman must direct his remarks to the merits of the new definition and the new fees payable.

Mr. King: The present policy of increasing the concessionary licence fee from 5p to £5 is a step in an unavoidable and necessary direction, and most people should welcome it as entirely realistic. However, we should look towards a better system which would enable all pensioners to benefit from a reduced licence fee, and eventually eliminate the greater part of it, if not all of it. I accept the regulations, but hopefully this will be one of the last occasions on which we have to debate them.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I shall be very brief. The Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, in its 30th report, drew the attention of the House to the instrument. The House should be grateful to the Opposition for tabling a prayer against this negative procedure instrument. I remind the House that negative procedure instruments are never debated unless a prayer is tabled. They are brought before the House by agreement, and many prayers are entirely ignored. We have this opportunity because the Opposition have taken the trouble to bring the matter to the House.

The 30th report of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments has not been referred to so far. The Committee does not consider the merits of regulations. We are charged with considering ambiguities and drafting. The Committee says that the drafting appears defective because the definition of those who qualify for concessionary television licences are people who live in "a group of at least four dwellings within a common and exclusive boundary".

Such people in sheltered accommodation include retired people of pensionable age. The question arises whether the exclusive definition in paragraph 7 applies to a warden's residence. The services of a warden are an important qualifying provision when obtaining concessionary licences.

It is important that delegated legislation is clear beyond peradventure, because it is subject to action in the courts. This is an area that has been subject to court action. It therefore seems right that the Committee should have drawn the House's attention to this ambiguity, which is best avoided in case the matter is subject to further challenge.

The Committee is obliged to give the Department an opportunity to provide an answer before it reports to the House. The Home Office replied in a memorandum that the warden's residence was included in the exclusive zone and that the regulations could not operate unless it was taken in that way.

The Committee believes that, when an order is made, it should be absolutely clear in writing, rather than by means of implication—hence our report to the House. I hope that the Minister can give us some assurance about that, so that it is on the record.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: The hon. Gentleman is making a useful contribution to the debate. I also listened carefully to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick). Am I right to assume that the regulations do not take account of the High Court judgment in favour of the Kirklees local authority? Am I right to think that the cheaper television licence for the elderly is not being extended to people in private retirement, residential warden-supervised accommodation, in accordance with the recommendation of the High Court in the Kirklees judgment? If so, it seems extraordinary for us to debate regulations which make concessions but do not extend them in accordance with the judgment of the High Court.

Mr. Cryer: The Committee was certainly not competent to comment on that, as that would involve considering the merits of the regulations. It appears, however, that the Minister has not met the requirements of the court.

It is poor of the Government not to meet clearly the court's comments in the Kirklees case and not to give pensioners who have spent years working for the country —many of them fought for it in the 1939-45 war—this concession. Many of them feel strongly about the matter. Many of us receive letters on the subject and meet pensioners who recognise the anomalies. The regulations are a little confusing, so some of the anomalies will continue. Pensioners feel that those anomalies are unjust. They would rather have a £5 licence fee for all pensioners as a stage towards free licences, which is what the Labour party believes is the correct answer.

Opposition Members can tonight vote positively in favour of the prayer to revoke the regulations, as a step in the right direction. We hope that the Conservatives will not act as organised scrooges and go into the Lobby to deny pensioners justice. They may do so, but we shall vote positively for the prayer to ensure that pensioners know that there is a party in the Chamber that is concerned for decency and justice.

11.5 pm

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) sought to equate his proposals with the idea of free bus passes and said that no hon. Member could oppose those. He wanted free bus passes for all. I must inform him that there is at least one hon. Member who will speak against them, for exactly the same reason that I shall speak against the principle of concessionary television licences for all.

There is no such thing as a free television licence—or a free bus pass. When the late but little lamented Greater London council in its infinite wisdom sought to give every Londoner a free bus pass, it was in effect laying a rate levy of £20 per pass on every Londoner. We know that many of those passes were issued to people who, because they were free, threw them into drawers and did not use them.

I represent a constituency in which 30 per cent. of the population are over retirement age. They range from people on state retirement pensions and supplementary benefit right up to some with private pensions and incomes who are very rich. I want the greatest possible help to be given to those in maximum need, and the minimum unnecessary assitance to be given to those who patently do not need it.

Mr. Greg Knight: Do not the Government deserve credit for introducing, as from next year, the pay-as-you-go scheme, whereby those who cannot afford to take out a licence in one go will be able to obtain one on payment of the first instalment?

Mr. Gale: My hon. Friend touches on the crux of the argument and something that represents a major step forward. It will be of tremendous assistance to many of my constituents.

I see no point in giving unnecessary aid that is supposedly free. It is not free: it will be a charge on others. The hon. Member for Walsall, North said—when he reads Hansard he may regret this—that if every pensioner paid £5 Labour Members would have no quarrel with the Government. That was slightly at variance with what his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) said—that a Labour Government, if ever elected, would phase out the TV licence fee for all pensioner households. So a pensioner living in Cliftonville with a Rolls-Royce or Jaguar parked in the drive and a large house would get an unnecessary free licence while a disabled single parent would still pay the full fee. That is arrant nonsense.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) drew attention to the crux of part of this argument—the anomalies that existed in the past. Thanet district council has tried to unravel the regulations over the years and has made a pig's ear of the job. The net result has been blocks of flats in Thanet in which pensioners living on the ground and first floors get concessionary licences—at 5p, they are effectively free—but pensioners on the second floor, which is deemed, because there is no lift, to be unsuitable for pensioners, do not—in spite of their being roughly the same age and on the same incomes, although perhaps more agile. That is wrong.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst went on to draw a correct comparison between those who happen to live in housing associaton sheltered housing or public sector sheltered housing, and those living in private sector housing—for example, the developments built by McCarthy and Stone Developments. The disposable income—that is what really counts—of those living in both kinds of accommodation is probably similar, but one group gets concessionary licences, and the other group does not.

Through these regulations my hon. Friend the Minister has sought to begin—I trust that this is an interim measure—to unravel some of the anomalies. My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) correctly drew attention to the pay-as-you-go scheme. I am certain that my constituents will welcome and take advantage of the scheme, because the lump sum that they have had to pay previously will now be payable in smaller doses, and therefore will be more affordable.

All this begs the question that my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) raised. In its unanimous report, the Select Committee on Home Affairs recommended the retention of the licence fee, and for one simple reason. Although there is the technology to provide an alternative, it is not yet in place. For some time some of us have been advocating the installation of Peritelevision sockets in sets that would enable fee collection by subscription, but a system for that is not yet in place, so the Select Committee recommended, correctly and unanimously, that for the forseeable future, the licence fee should be maintained.

The Select Committee went on to recommend, as a matter of urgency, that, by 1990, every set sold should have a Peritelevision socket. That will lead, I hope, inevitably and inexorably, to the abolition of the licence fee in toto, so that all television is paid for by advertising or subscription. Conservative Members look forward to the day when all pensioners are not given concessionary bus passes or licences, or anything else.

Ms. Mowlam: They should have a decent pension.

Mr. Gale: The Conservative party is working towards the adequate pension provision that the Labour party failed to provide when it was in power. We believe that the elderly should be given the right to choose what they pay for, whether it be private or public transport, television, concert tickets or anything else. The way forward will be, ultimately, the abolition of the licence fee in its entirety and the payment by those who view for what they choose to view.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North East): The hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) is correct to say that there is no such thing as a free bus pass or a free television licence. Both these concessions have to be paid for. However, the Opposition are prepared to pay for these concessions, while the Government are not.

This is not so much a broadcasting issue as a social one. It is universally recognised that for the elderly and the disabled, television, metaphorically and in some cases literally, is a lifeline. That is particularly so for those who live alone and want to be independent, and those who, in that often repeated and somewhat pathetic phrase, do not wish to be a burden. Those who want to preserve their privacy and dignity and to remain integrated in the community are, paradoxically, the people who get no benefit from these regulations.

I welcome the fact that some additional institutions will qualify, but the definition that the regulations embrace of individual homes is most curious, because it endeavours to make individual homes assume the character of an institution. They must have a common and exclusive boundary, a resident or full-time warden and something archly described as a communal facility. The present arrangements occasion great aggravation. I suspect that sometimes the postbags of all hon. Members contain letters from constituents complaining of the anomaly that exists. They do not appreciate the fact that they do not qualify, while people elsewhere in exactly the same position do.

My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) told me of three tower blocks in his constituency, one of which qualifies, but the other two of which do not. All three contain pensioners who, for all practical purposes, reside in the same circumstances, and who find it amazing and aggravating that some qualify and some do not.

The increase in the concessionary licence fee from 5p to £5 provides the opportunity to extend the concession to all old-age pensioners, because previously the costs of collection far exceeded the revenue that the concessionary licence generated. The concessionary sum of £5 allows for economic collection and is probably within the scope of most pensioners to pay. A simple solution would be to put the concessionary television licence on the same footing as a bus pass, which has already been referred to as something that has enjoyed unqualified success.

I have said already that this is a social issue, not a broadcasting one, and the inevitable consequence is that the shortfall in revenue should be met, not by the BBC, but by general taxation. I am happy to advocate that, and I suspect that outside the House there would be considerable support for that view.

Like many hon. Members, I wish that it was not necessary to have concessions for pensioners. If the hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) is correct in saying that the Government are moving to a day when that will not be necessary, he will receive applause from me and other hon. Members when that occurs. However, I beg leave to display some cynicism about how soon the millennium for pensioners will arrive.

The concession that has been allowed in the past has become selective and discriminatory. It would be right and proper to make it universal, and there is hardly a person in the country who would not applaud the Government if they were to do so.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): The question of the concessionary television licence has been with us for a long time, because my predecessor, John Mendelson, raised it in 1976, 1977 and 1978, and I carried it on in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and each year since, and I will continue to do so. As for voting, I remind the House that on one marvellous occasion on a ten-minute Bill, one of my colleagues decided that I had not gone far enough. He said that I was putting my toe in the water to test the temperature, but he would prefer to go in a little further. He divided the House and there were 197 votes for and none against, which meant that no Conservative Member had the courage to go with us or to go against us.

Those hon. Members did not go against us purely because of the voting patterns. They knew that they would infuriate millions of old-age pensioners by voting against. They decided not to take their courage in their hands, but to sit on their seats. I remember the Whips running round keeping them in their seats. If we are talking about voting, 197 to nil is worth mentioning.

I would like old-age pensions to be so high that pensioners had no need for concessionary television licences or travel warrants. But we should be fooling ourselves if we thought that that could be achieved in the near future. It will not. We have been talking about adequate pensions for some time. The link between earnings and pensions was cut, thus reducing considerably the value of pensions. We have not given people a large enough pension to make such concessions unnecessary.

Some hon. Members said that people buy newspapers, some of which cost 30p, and that television costs only 16p a day. But many pensioners in my constituency do not buy newspapers, because most of them must save every penny. I cite the example of my mother in that respect—I buy newspapers for her since she said that she could not afford them. I do not know what world Conservative Members live in, but pensioners in my constituency use the reading rooms of local libraries if they want to read the newspapers.

Television is a source of company for some pensioners. I again cite my mother as an example. I telephone her every night—she will not go to bed until she knows that I am all right—and the first thing that she says is, "Wait until I turn off the television. I have had it on for company." There are thousands like her. Pensioners with Rolls-Royces are few and far between. By far the majority of pensioners in my constituency have never seen a Rolls-Royce.

Let us talk about the real world and about what the regulations will mean. Why did the Government decide to limit their provisions to

"a group of at least four dwellings within a common and exclusive boundary"?

Why four? Why not two, three, five or six? Where has that figure been plucked from? On what basis are we legislating for groups of four dwellings? What is a "common and exclusive boundary"? How far can it extend? At present, the concessionary licence is granted to a local authority house that has communal facilities and a warden. There are resident wardens, walking wardens where there are no communal facilities and walking wardens where there are communal facilities. The dwellings are in goups of twos, threes and fours, sometimes stretched out over a large area.

What is the Minister after? He does not want the High Court ruling to be implemented. He is wary about granting an extension that could be considered unfair, so he is trying to stabilise the position. The Minister is creating a launching pad for the future. The BBC has calculated that the cost of the licence must increase each year by 2 per cent. above the retail price index. The £5 fee will not remain for long. Will the Minister say definitely whether this is the be-all and end-all, or are the regulations a launching pad for fees of £6, £7, £8 or £9? The Government have decided to remove the anomaly in their usual way—not by increasing the number of people who can obtain the 5p concessionary licence, but by increasing the fee to £5. They can say that there is no longer an anomaly because everyone must pay the same.

When considering the cost of the concessionary licence, we should remember the Conservative Budgets of the past few years and all the money that the Government have given away to people who do not need it much. Using the basic rate of income tax as a guide, we know that it would cost only 0·2p for every pensioner household to have a concessionary licence. Using VAT, it would cost 0·24p for every pensioner household to have a concessionary licence. The House could decide on a combination of VAT, tax and an increased licence fee, provided everyone got the £5 concession.

With each Budget, the Government have willingly given away money and have forgotten the old-age pensioner's television licence. This is the biggest anomaly for years. It is time that we did away with it. This system is archaic and an insult to the 4·9 million pensioners in private and public dwellings who do not enjoy the concessionary licence fee.

Mr. Gerry Steinberg (City of Durham): Durham city council has about 4,000 pensioners linked to its pioneering sheltered accommodation scheme, and for the past 13 years many have qualified for the concessionary 5p licence scheme. For almost the past two years, because further applications were made as more pensioners joined the council's innovative scheme, the National Television Licence Records Office has not granted any concessionary television licences. The delay and uncertainty have caused anguish and confusion to many of my elderly constitutents who have been harassed and threatened by the licence office.

Some bungalows and flats qualify automatically, but 3,000 tenants were left without cover while the dispute about what constituted a group dwelling rumbled on. Many old folk received warning letters about holding valid licences and some were visited by licence investigators. There is the example of an 80-year-old widow who was petrified about being sent to prison because of the threatening letter that she had received from the licence office. It brought on an angina attack. That innocent old lady was caught in a trap brought about by the Government's callousness and deviousness. I can quote dozens of such cases.

The local authority was blamed for the Government's incompetence. Many old people could not sleep because of the worry about having to find £60, for which they had not budgeted. Some paid for the licence when they were entitled to it for 5p. The old people of Durham were caught in limbo, not knowing whether they were covered by a licence or were facing prosecution. Despite frequent attempts by me and the city council to get a positive response from the National Television Licence Records Office and the Minister, the council's efforts went unanswered, apart from the council being told that the office was awaiting advice from the Home Office.

Why were those people who had received concessionary television licences in accordance with the criteria laid down by the 1984 legislation and those pensioners who had joined the scheme later and qualified for the concession now unable to get it? Those pensioners included those living in sheltered housing; those with the services of a resident warden, good neighbour warden or mobile warden living in flats, houses or bungalows; and all those who had the city care alarm system fitted—the Home Office had previously accepted it as a modification to a property when occupied by a person of pensionable age —together with other associated facilities, such as the services of a warden, the presence of a luncheon club and meals-on-wheels service and any other welfare facilities.

The Government did that because they were proposing a change in the concessionary licence scheme which they were not prepared to divulge to those asking the questions. The Government were proposing to inhibit the regulations and prevent many old people from getting a concessionary licence. It is now clear that the new criteria apply only to purpose-built accommodation for the elderly in groups of not less than four dwellings with one continuous boundary and shared facilities, such as a communal hall and a resident warden who shall spend at least 30 hours a week devoted to that scheme. The criteria do not apply to mainstream housing.

Many new applicants in Durham who would have qualified under the old regulations will not under the new regulations. Apart from being extremely uncaring and spiteful, they will cause anomalies and distress to many old people in my constituency, and, I assume, to many old people in many other constituencies throughout the country. There will be neighbouring dwellings where one person will receive the concession and the other will not, yet they will be living in the same conditions, where one received it previously under the old regulations and will keep it, yet another in exactly the same type of property and conditions will now not receive it.

Purpose-built accommodation is virtually no longer being constructed because of the Government's massive cuts in housing capital. Local authorities are looking at other ways of caring for their old and elderly population. As I said, central control care schemes can give protection to thousands of pensioners in both the public and private sectors. For the cost of, say, two sheltered schemes, which would cover only a handful of old people, one can now cover thousands of people with a controlled city care system such as Durham has.

Surely it would not have been too much to expect the Government to allow all in those schemes a concessionary television licence. Ideally, I should like to see a free television licence for all pensioners, regardless of where they live, their incomes and their circumstances, and regardless of the cost. We have heard about that. That is the least that we can do for our elderly citizens who have served this country through two world wars and been prepared to give their lives for it. I am certain that the next Labour Government will be committed to doing that. I shall fully support them, as my comrades will.

To cut the number who will get the concession—[Interruption.] I have sat in the Chamber for about five hours today, and I intend to have my say regardless of the interruptions from the hon. Member for Rochdale (Sir C. Smith) whom I hardly ever see in the House [Interruption.] I am talking no more drivel than the rubbish that I have heard from Conservative Members in the debate.

To cut the number who will get the concession and to raise the concession fee from 5p to £5 is, to say the least, mean and uncaring, but that is exactly what I have come to expect from that lot on the Conservative Benches.

11.32 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Tim Renton): In this short debate I found the hypocritical indignation of the hon. Members for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) and for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), to mention but two Opposition Members, extraordinary. What are we doing tonight? We are extending the concession for all those who have had it before. We are extending it for the first time to those in residential nursing homes, and we are bringing in restrictions on further extensions. All that is at the cost of increasing the fee from 5p to £5 a week—[HON. MEMBERS: "A week?] A year. Let me remind the House that the 5p has not changed since the scheme was introduced in 1969. In that time the colour licence fee has gone up by over £50, and the single pension by nearly £37 a week. The increase in the concessionary fee is less than £5 a year, a mere 1½p a day, which is less than one hundredth of the increase in the single pension that we introduced in the Budget.

Listening to Opposition Members, one would think that we were increasing the licence fee by perhaps 50 per cent.—by £31—yet that would be the precise effect if we followed what the hon. Member for Walsall, North has suggested. If we were to introduce free licences for every pensioner it would, as my hon. Friend for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) said, mean an extra £360 million a year. If that had to be found from every other television licence holder, as it should be, it would mean an increase of 50 per cent. That is the Peacock point that the hon. Member for Erdington misquoted—that if anyone needed a concession on his television licence it was those on what used to be called supplementary benefit, now income support. It is precisely some of those who would have to pay the extra £31 a year, this extra 50 per cent., if we were to follow the Opposition's suggestions.

In the short time available I should like to recount the brief history of the scheme and what we are doing as a result of the Kirklees judgment. The licence scheme has existed in more or less the same form for nearly 20 years. The aim and scope of the scheme have been accepted by every Government, whatever their political persuasion, since 1969. A few improvements have been made over the years, the most notable being the extension of the scheme to disabled people in 1984. Typically, that was done by a Conservative Government, just as we have now extended it to nursing homes.

The underlying intention of the scheme, which was to benefit pensioners and, latterly, disabled people living in residential homes or in sheltered housing run by a local authority or housing association, remained unchanged for many years. The High Court judgment in the case brought by Kirklees metropolitan council changed all that. One of the three tests under the old rules was whether accommodation provided a common facility for the use of all residents. The Kirklees judgment widened that part of the definition to include housing stewards with some responsibilities for the care of residents.

In the light of the Kirklees judgment, it was also clear that the scope for the other two tests—that the housing formed part of a group and was specially provided for retirement pensioners and disabled people—had become wider than originally intended. That undermined the long-standing principle accepted by Governments of both parties and opened the way for the extension of the scheme to many people in mainstream housing. Such people were never intended by the Labour Government or, it must be said, by this Government, to benefit from the scheme.

I listened with great interest to my hon. Friends who suggested that the days of the BBC television licence might be coming to an end. We are not yet at that point.

Mr. Grocott rose——

Mr. Renton: No, I shall not give way, because I have only a few minutes left in which to reply and I want to deal with a point raised about the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments.

If we had not acted, the finances of the BBC would have been under great pressure and we would have had to increase the television licence fee by up to 50 per cent. for everyone else, including many people who are less well able to afford it than pensioners. The whole basis of the concessionary scheme would have broken down, giving rise to indefensible anomalies.

I should now like to deal with the important matter raised by the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer). I assure him that we carefully considered the point raised by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. I think he will accept that it goes to the drafting rather than to the substance. In our reply to the Committee we tried to make clear our firm view that there is no internal inconsistency in the regulations. They require a sheltered housing scheme to have an exclusive boundary and a resident warden. The scheme must contain no dwellings other than those meeting the requirements of the regulations and that of the resident warden. In practice, that is the interpretation that we are placing on the regulations. We have had no complaints on this score and we do not expect any.

I should like to deal with the matter raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Chiselhurst (Mr. Sims). In his moderate and friendly speech he dealt with a matter about which he is greatly concerned—the right to extend the scheme to privately run or sheltered housing schemes. As I have said before, that would not be justified, because this is an attractive and fast-growing sector of the owner-occupier market. We recognise that many private sheltered schemes display characteristics that are similar to those in schemes run by local authorities or housing associations. To include privately run or sheltered housing schemes would once again lead to an extension of the scheme far beyond its original intention. The regulations aim to get back to the original intention.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Renton: No. With great respect to my hon. Friend, I must deal with questions asked by other hon. Members.

Mr. Winterton: It was a very inadequate answer.

Mr. Renton: I always appreciate my hon. Friend's robust comments.

I listened with great interest to the challenging speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King), who said that, with the growth of satellite channels and the greater choice that that will bring, there may be no television licence fee. The logic of having no television licence fee is that no one will pay for the use of a standard television set, and that would apply to pensioners as well as everyone else.

One might have thought that the Labour party would have welcomed that proposition when my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary touched on it in a speech the other day. Instead, they sucked their teeth in horror. That is typical of their lack of logic. They appear to believe in having free television licences for pensioners, but much more expensive licences for everyone else, including some of those on income support.

The hon. Member for Erdington returned to a well-known bribe—the fantasy promise of the Labour party that it will provide free television licences for all pensioners. If that point had been made by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), who was originally booked to open the debate, I might have understood it. It would have been an election bribe. We all understand that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook is fighting an election at the moment. Doubtless his good comrade the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) would have gone around hatching a scheme to give not only free television, but free video recorders and lots of other freebies to every Labour dowager on the books. It is a nonsensical scheme.

[Mr. Renton]

It is not serious policy. It is a mere gesture. It is a substitute for reflective thought and practical action, and in his heart the hon. Member for Erdington knows that full well.

The Government of whom I am proud to be a member, on the other hand, have maintained the value of the state retirement pension, presided over a record growth in pensioners' incomes, protected pensioners' savings, and seen pensioners' total income rise by 18 per cent. in the years between 1979 and 1985—twice the increase for the population as a whole, and four times the increase under the Labour Government.

The Government's record on pensions is far better than anything that the hon. Member for Erdington and his colleagues can offer. The support that pensioners gave us in the general election and in every opinion poll since then shows that the pensioners know that we are a Government whom they can trust to deliver the goods for them. Neither they nor we——

Chlorofluorocarbons and the Ozone Layer

[Relevant Document: First Report of the Environment Committee (House of Commons Paper No. 270 of Session 1987-88) on Air Pollution.]

11.54 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Colin Moynihan): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 8335/87 and 4997/88 + COR1 on control of chlorofluorocarbons and the ozone layer; supports the implementation of the Montreal Protocol through Community-wide action; endorses the control of consumption of ozone-depleting substances through control of their overall supply; and encourages continuing action by all sectors of industry on a voluntary basis to reduce use of these substances to the maximum possible extent.

Document No. 8335/87 is a proposal for a decision seeking the Council's authorisation of Community signature of a protocol to the Vienna convention for the protection of the ozone layer. The proposal was submitted on 11 September 1987, at a time when international negotiations were reaching their conclusion. The Council's authorisation was given by means of urgent written procedure in time for the conference of plenipotentiaries held in Montreal from 14 to 16 September. On 16 September, what is now called the Montreal protocol on substances that deplete the ozone layer was signed by the Community, the United Kingdom and most other member states.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State explained on 13 January in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington), the House was in recess at that time and it was not possible for the normal scrutiny procedures to be carried out. The Government, however, kept the House informed of developments, including the outcome of the diplomatic conference. The text of the protocol was published as a Command Paper and laid before both Houses in January, in accordance with the usual practice, before ratification by the United Kingdom.

The protocol contains measures to control the production and consumption of two groups of chemicals with the potential to damage the ozone layer: chlorofluorocarbons—CFCs—11, 12, 113, 114 and 115, and halons 1211, 1301 and 2402.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The purpose of halons for manufacturing industry is connected mostly with fire retardants. This involves major policy. There is obviously great advantage in using halons, as any chemist knows. Could the Minister explain—either in the winding-up speech or at his convenience—the Government's policy towards the non-use of halons, given that it will make fire retardant materials far more difficult, and certainly far more expensive, to manufacture?

Mr. Moynihan: I shall certainly elaborate the point during my winding-up speech. However, I shall take this opportunity to tell the hon. Gentleman that he is absolutely right: halons are widely used in fire extinguishers, and we need to promote active research into alternative substances that have the same effect without depleting the ozone layer. That will require time. One of the problems is the substitution of halons in fire extinguishers, particularly in developing countries. As the hon. Gentleman has pointed out, that is expensive.

[Mr. Moynihan]

CFCs are used for such purposes as refrigeration, foam-blowing and aerosol propellants. As the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has said, halons are used primarily as fire retardants. The protocol provides for production and consumption of CFCs to be reduced progressively to 50 per cent. of 1986 levels by 1999. Production and consumption of halons is to be frozen by 1993. There is some flexibility to exceed the production limits, but solely for the purposes of industrial rationalisation and to guarantee supplies to low-consuming developing country parties. Such countries have more time to comply with the measures. Unlike the provisions limiting trade with non-parties, the special provisions for developing countries are designed to encourage countries to join the protocol.

We are keen that there should be the widest possible participation in the protocol, and we are doing what we can, through diplomatic and industrial channels, to encourage as many developing countries as possible to sign the protocol.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Does the Minister recognise that many people will be disappointed by the approach that has been taken tonight? Will he assure the House that the Government will give speedy consideration to the report of the Select Committee on the Environment, which deals with CFCs, and that the Government's response will be published as soon as possible? At that stage there should be a further debate. Perhaps the response to the section of the report on CFCs should be speedier than the response to other parts.

Mr. Moynihan: The Government have considered the Select Committee's recommendations seriously and will take on board the importance that the hon. Gentleman has attached to them. We are taking a tough line on production, as we did with the Americans during the negotiations. We have been —[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) laughs, but that is a fact. We have been pushing extremely hard for a comprehensive ban on CFCs rather than a selective one. We are aware that CFCs, wherever they come from, have a depleting effect on the ozone layer. As the Select Committee urges, we must tackle the overall problem.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Is the Minister denying that the Americans wanted a greater cut in production than that for which the EEC was arguing, and that within the EEC Britain was one of the countries arguing for a smaller cut than that proposed by the Community?

Mr. Moynihan: I am denying that. I am saying categorically that we are looking for a greater cut in production during the negotiations. We were urging the Americans to move from specific bans to an overall ban for the reason that I have outlined. It is important internationally to ensure that we control CFCs, reduce them and take into account any new technology that makes it possible to take further measures. An important part of the protocol is the opportunity to review in the light of new scientific developments and technology.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the Minister clarify the passage on the second page of the memorandum, which, referring to article 7, states:

"There are also measures limiting imports from countries not party to the protocol."?

Is it not a fact that it will be difficult administratively to do that? I am told that it will be extremely difficult.

Mr. Moynihan: It will be difficult, but not impossible. It is our intention to put in place appropriate measures to ensure that the objective is achieved. I shall deal with them later.

We are keen that there should be the widest possible participation in the protocol. For example, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, in his forthcoming visit to China, will seek to persuade the Chinese to adopt the protocol. If he succeeds in doing so, that will bring 1 billion people within it, many of whom are important users of CFCs and halons. If we can ensure that China is persuaded during my right hon. Friend's visit, that will be an important move forward. Incidentally, today he persuaded the Swedish Minister who is responsible for these matters to take this line.

The protocol expressly provides for the control measures to be reviewed in 1990, and at least every four years thereafter in the light of available scientific, environmental, technical and economic information. Since Montreal, our understanding of the science has continued to develop. The Department's stratospheric ozone review group—an independent advisory body of experts—has been keeping a close watch on the situation. At the Department's request, the group agreed to the release on 14 June of the executive summary, of its forthcoming second report. In the summary the group says that it is now virtually certain that the hole in the ozone layer over the Antarctic is caused by CFCs, which are also implicated in ozone depletion above other parts of the globe, including the United Kingdom. The group gives a clear warning that unless emissions are greatly reduced, and possibly phased out, more severe depletion of statospheric ozone is likely to occur.

The Government will be studying the report carefully as soon as it is available, but we are already taking careful note of the summary and its warning about the need to strengthen the protocol. Our first priority, however, shared with our partners in the European Community, is to ensure that the protocol enters into force on 1 January 1989, as planned, and with the widest possible participation. This will allow the protocol's own review procedures to be put into effect.

That brings me to document No. 4997/88, which comprises two proposals. These are a decision on ratification of the Vienna convention and the Montreal protocol by the European Community and member states, and a regulation laying down common rules for implementing the protocol within the Community. The document COR1 merely makes some minor drafting changes to the proposals in document No. 4997/88.

As the House will be aware, on 16 June, the Environment Council reached agreement in principle on the proposals, subject to parliamentary reserves from the United Kingdom and several other member states. The United Kingdom parliamentary reserve was entered because it had not been possible to arrange before then a debate called for in the reports of the Select Committee on documents 8335/87 and 4997/88 and because the scrutiny process in another place had not yet been completed. When both Houses are satisfied, the United Kingdom will be able to lift its reserve on the proposals.

The United Kingdom ratified the decisions at the Vienna convention as long ago as 1987, and it was the first European country to do so. France is the only other member state to have ratified. All other member states have now signed the protocol, except Ireland and Spain. The proposed decision originally sought to achieve simultaneous ratification of both instruments by 15 September 1988. In discussion, the deadline has been extended to 1 October for the convention and 31 December for the protocol.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): My hon. Friend has mentioned the pressure that we put on the Americans to reach agreement with us. Has he been able to put any pressure on the Russians to abide by the terms of the protocol?

Mr. Moynihan: It is not a matter of applying pressure, but there is joint recognition with the Soviet Union of the importance of ensuring that the protocol is properly implemented. I shall come to those countries which have signed since Montreal, not least the Soviet Union and the Ukrainian SSR and Byelorussian SSR.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Will the Minister confirm or deny that the British Government argued in the Common Market that there should be 90 per cent. ratification of the protocol before it was implemented, and that that gave the Soviet Union a veto?

Mr. Moynihan: I can confirm that that was the thrust of discussions at that time. The hon. Gentleman will know that we have moved forward considerably from that. Obviously, we want to ensure that we achieve further signatories. For example, we understand that the United States and Mexico have since ratified.

Turning to the regulation, the United Kingdom has consistently supported implementation of the protocol through Communitywide action by means of a regulation which is directly applicable in all member states. This is the only way of ensuring that the necessary legislative framework for implementation is in place throughout the Community in good time before the protocol comes into force.

The regulation reflects the dual control of production and consumption in the protocol and applies the protocol limits directly to individual firms. There are limits on the amounts produced by each company. Consumption is controlled through the control of the overall supply of CFCs and halons by limiting the amounts which producing companies can sell within the Community, or use themselves, and the amounts which firms may import from outside the Community. The United Kingdom has firmly supported controlling consumption by controlling supply rather than controlling specific uses, a method which has been shown elsewhere to be inefficient and inflexible—for example, the aerosols in the United States to which I have referred. Rather, it is left to market forces to determine the use to which available supplies are put as prices rise.

In addition to the central control provisions, there are measures, in parallel with those in the protocol, to limit imports from non-parties. There is a management committee to advise the Commission on detailed matters of implementation and provisions for data reporting, inspections and for action if the regulation is infringed.

I shall keep the hon. Member for Linlithgow in touch on that point as we receive further information, because he was right to say that it is technically difficult to ensure that we achieve that objective.

Inevitably, in discussion of the Commission's proposals by member states, some changes have been made, but the regulation agreed in principle does not differ substantially from the original proposals. The main changes are to the provisions relating to import licences, production, inspections and infringement. Import licences are now to be issued by member states rather than by the Commission. Production increases allowed under the protocol for the purposes of industrial rationalisation and to meet the basic domestic needs of developing countries have to be agreed with the member state concerned, and there is now express provision rationalisation within member states. The provision whereby production quotas could be reallocated in the event of a producer beginning production after 1986 has been dropped.

Several changes have been made to the provisions for inspections, including a requirement for the agreement of the member state concerned to Commission officials assisting those of the member state in carrying out inspections, and for the Commission to take appropriate measures to protect the confidentiality of the information obtained. The provisions dealing with infringements have been simplified on the basis that member states should take appropriate legal or administrative action in the event of the regulation being infringed.

In its report, the Select Committee said that it did not understand the statement in the Department's explanatory memorandum on document 4997/88 that the measures in the regulation were not inconsistent with the Government's preference for achieving the reductions required by voluntary action.

The regulation lays down the basic minimum legal framework within which there is complete flexibility for industry to take steps to reduce the use of CFCs and halons on a voluntary or self-regulatory basis. This self-regulatory approach has already worked well with existing Community measures to establish a production ceiling for CFCs 11 and 12 and to effect reductions in aerosol use. We are keen to encourage a continuation of this kind of approach. Indeed, an essential element of the package agreed at the Environment Council on 16 June was a political resolution which stressed the importance of further voluntary measures to reduce the use of CFCs and halons to the maximum possible extent.

Mr. Dalyell: In its 32nd report of Session 1987-88, the Select Committee on European Legislation states:

"The resolution also invites the Commission to seek voluntary agreement with industry on a common Community label for CFC-free products."

Has such agreement been reached? Its importance was emphasised at a meeting that my hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) arranged with his constituent, Mr. Beckitt, and others, of ICI Runcorn. This is a matter of some importance.

Mr. Moynihan: To the best of my knowledge, agreement on that has not yet been reached, but voluntary action by individual producers has progressed. If more information has emerged since I was briefed on this subject, I shall let the hon. Gentleman know in my winding-up speech.

[Mr. Moynihan]

In the United Kingdom, the aerosol industry has announced that it will phase out non-essential use of CFCs in aerosols by the end of 1989. As aerosols represent over 60 per cent. of CFC use in the United Kingdom, we shall be well ahead of the Montreal timetable for CFC reductions, but we are anxious that all sectors of industry should reduce consumption on a voluntary basis, and officials of my Department and of the Department of Trade and Industry have regular meetings with users of CFCs and halons to establish what steps they are taking to reduce consumption. Moreover, the United Kingdom producers are actively engaged in research and development work to identify and test suitable and safe substitutes and have joined with other firms in Europe, The United States and Japan to hasten the process of commercial development.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre)): What steps are the Government taking to encourage research into other, safer, CFCs? Is the research being carried out quickly enough?

Mr. Moynihan: It is important that we push ahead with research urgently. Much research has borne fruit in terms of industry's immediate response, but we are committed, through the protocol, to give suitable assistance to further research in the Community and abroad. That has financial implications which have been taken on board, not least by the Overseas Development Administration. I am satisfied that considerable research is pushing ahead. There is clearly much more work to be done in the light of further evidence of the science attached to depletion of the ozone layer and the range of substances involved. More needs to be done, but I am satisfied that a good deal of initial work has been beneficial.

The Montreal protocol is a major environmental achievement. Since its adoption last year, our understanding of the science has developed and there have been calls for the protocol to be strengthened. In view of the new evidence, we need to prepare for an orderly assessment of the science for the first scheduled review of the measures in 1990. This process of review is already beginning and there will be a series of international scientific and technical meetings in the Netherlands this October, in which the United Kingdom will participate fully. The report of our stratospheric ozone research group, the full version of which should be published in September, will form an important contribution to the review, but the first priority must be to get the protocol into force. I commend the motion to the House.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): The Minister and I will not disagree to the same extent as we did in the recent debate on acid rain, but we will disagree about the scope of the Montreal convention and how effective the Government's response to the issue has been. We shall disagree, too, on the Government's role in getting the EEC to water down its joint approach to the discussions that took place in Montreal.

Everyone—not only the Minister—has problems pronouncing chlorofluorocarbons. Our Chief Whip had to rehearse it before the parliamentary Labour party meeting last Thursday, at which he had to say the word in the course of announcing the business. I am pleased to see that so many Conservative Members are interested in chlorofluorocarbons. Either that, or they represent the chemical industry constituencies—there is nothing wrong with that—or they think there will be a vote. I cannot imagine why so many of them are here at this late hour. I used to complain regularly that important environmental issues were put to too late at night and that we should have more serious debates at earlier times so that more hon. Members would be present to discuss them.

There is a theatre called the Theatre in Conservation. It is an environmentalist theatre, a non-party organisation, that puts on shows for children. It is putting on a pantomime at the moment, in which Fluorocarbon is the wicked witch, who comes out of the aerosol can, the ugly sisters are SO_x and NO_x and the heroes are Dick Whittington and his catalytic converter and the Greenpeace warriors. So if, in future, the Minister has problems pronouncing chlorofluorocarbons, he has only to think of the Theatre in Conservation and the wicked witch Fluorocarbon, who is destroying our ozone layer.

This is a serious matter. The closing statement from the 330 policy makers and scientists from the 48 countries represented at the Montreal convention began thus:

> "Humanity is conducting an enormous, unintended, globally pervasive experiment whose ultimate consequences could be second only to a global nuclear war."

That was not said by the Labour party, or by me. It was said by those policy makers who discussed the changing atmosphere implications for global security in Toronto in June.

It is imperative to act now to avert an impending crisis of atmospheric pollution. The ozone layer is the only one that we have. If we do not take action now, on the grounds that the link is not proven, and it is later proven, it could easily be too late. The conference identified CFCs, the chemicals believed to be the primary cause of ozone depletion, as important contributors also to the greenhouse effect and called for their near-complete elimination by 2000—a point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and by the Select Committee.

In the debate on acid rain I was a little critical of the Select Committee's recommendations for not going far enough, but on this issue the Committee has got it virtually perfectly right. I hope that the Government will respond to its recommendations—

Mr. Thurnham: What does the hon. Gentleman mean when he says that the Select Committee has got it virtually perfectly right? With what does he disagree in the report? Is he aware that the British Refrigeration Association has said that it would be almost impossible to replace existing systems if the Committee's report on R22 were accepted? The Heating and Ventilating Contractors Association has said that the consequences for keeping food refrigerated would be unthinkable.

Mr. Roberts: I thought that Conservative Members were here because they represented certain interests. Industries always say that it is impossible to act until they have to, and then find a way of doing so. "Impossible" merely means that the chemical industry might have to spend too much and is worried about its competitors.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Might there not be something rather more genuine, in that the chemical industry does not want to produce new poisons, and there is such a thing as toxicity testing, which takes some time?

Mr. Roberts: The argument now is that the industry does not want to get rid of one poison because it might introduce another. Conservative Members are here in force. I shall come to these issues in a minute. I do not want to restrict the British chemical industry so much that it is not in a position to compete with the other chemical industries. However, the industry has to be careful about saying that things cannot be done when it does not know how to do them. As a member of the all-party chemical industries group, I believe that the way forward for the British chemical industry and Imperial Chemical Industries plc is to do the research and produce the substitutes for CFCs. It is sad that the American firm Du Pont is ahead of us, because that is the result of the American Government and, as a consequence, American industry, taking the issue more seriously than we did. We fell for the belief that CFCs were not doing the damage, and that if they were the extent was not proven. The research stopped, and now ICI is fighting desperately to catch up with Du Pont. I hope that it does; I do not want to harm our chemical industry.

The Montreal protocol is an international agreement to cut production and consumption of CFCs by 35 per cent. and 50 per cent. respectively by 1999. The House should be clear that that is not a 50 per cent. cut in production, but a 50 per cent. cut in consumption, and only a 35 per cent. cut in production. That means that we can sell CFCs abroad if we do not use them. We can sell them to the Third world, as though the Third world has a different ozone layer. That is where this protocol falls down. It does not go far enough. If the 50 per cent. cut had been in production and not just in consumption, we might have been on the way to having a significant protocol to ratify. Instead, hidden in the fine print is the fact that we may not be using as much, but our industries can produce it and sell it abroad. That is not the way forward, because just as much of the ozone layer will be lost as a result.

Many scientists believe that the cuts do not go anywhere near far enough, and that cuts of 85 per cent. are needed to stabilise the atmosphere. The Select Committee on the Environment recommended that the Montreal protocol be reconvened to negotiate reductions in consumption of CFCs to 15 per cent. of the 1986 levels. That is an 85 per cent. cut. It received good and expert evidence to that effect. That is also in line with the level regarded as necessary to stabilise the atmosphere, and the Government's response is still awaited.

On 14 June 1988, in a Department of the Environment press release—the only response that we have had from the Government—Lord Caithness, the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Water, announced:

"a group of prominent British scientists have advised the Government that unless emissions of CFCs are reduced much further than the levels required by the 1987 Montreal Protocol more severe depletion of the stratospheric ozone layer is likely to occur."

Those scientists are right. It is not clear what Government thinking about the extent and level of emission reductions required is, and the Minister's speech tonight neither made that clear nor answered the point that the Minister of State made.

On 16 June the EEC agreed to ratify the Montreal protocol. Each EEC member state will be required individually to fulfil the requirements of the protocol. However, we are worried, as we were about the acid rain protocol, about monitoring and implementation of the reduction. Questions need to be asked. It is not clear how effective monitoring of the implementation of the protocol would be put into effect.

The Nordic countries, rightly concerned about their environment, have already announced their intention to aim for reductions of over 90 per cent. by 1995. They have refrigerators, although it is colder there than it is here. They also have air conditioning systems. If they can do it, why can we not? It is exactly the same as retrofitting power stations and reducing acid rain—the Germans can do it, but we cannot. We always find an excuse.

Major problems remain, including the number of countries that are not party to the protocol which the Minister mentioned. There is the monitoring of imports and exports of CFC to ensure that CFC havens are not set up in countries not party to the protocol, which could easily happen. The protocol provision allowing for a 10 per cent. increase in production for low consumer countries to increase their per capita usage during industrial rationalisation is also an important issue.

The hon. Members who represent chemical industry constituencies are worried about British products. It is of considerable concern that the figures for United Kingdom production and consumption of CFCs are not available to the public. We learned only recently that more than 60 per cent. of United Kingdom CFC usage is in aerosols and that figure was much higher than expected.

In June 1988 the British Aerosol Manufacturers Association reversed its previous position and recommended that its members should label aerosols. The Select Committee on the Environment recommended mandatory ozone-friendly labelling schemes, but the Government are still saying, "Leave it to market forces." How we can leave the market to decide whether people should buy ozone-friendly aerosols or non-ozone-friendly aerosols when we do not have them labelled defeats me. I share the all-party recommendation of the Select Committee on the Environment that it cannot be left to market forces and that it should be a mandatory requirement for aerosols that do not have CFCs in them to be labelled "ozone-friendly".

The Select Committee also recommended banning CFCs in aerosols except for medical use, if the phasing out of CFCs is not rapid enough. In March, when giving evidence to the Select Committee, Lord Caithness said that the voluntary approach had worked. I dispute that. Articles in the industrial press suggest that consumer pressure and the fear of falling sales have been the key factors.

I am concerned about the amount of self-regulation by industry. The British Aerosol Manufacturers Association reports that by the end of 1989 only 10 per cent. of aerosols will use CFCs as propellants. That figure represents essential uses and, if that is true, it is good, but there is currently no procedure for challenging the definition of a product as an essential use, and the Government must consider introducing legislation. Furthermore, 10 per cent. is higher than in many countries which have already banned CFCs in aerosols, and because of the high proportion of CFC aerosols used in the United Kingdom, 10 per cent. is not negligible.

[Mr. Roberts]

The Select Committee on the Environment recommended that the Department of the Environment should take a strong lead in co-ordinating European research and that Government funds should be made available for that purpose. On 9 July 1988 newspapers reported that the Natural Environmental Research Council, which has been losing Government funds, is shedding 130 scientific posts. If the Minister is serious about those environmental issues, it is an absolute tragedy and a scandal that environmental research is not given higher priority by the Government.

There is massive scientific evidence of ozone depletion, the most up-to-date and reliable of which was published in March 1988 in the report of the Ozone Trends Panel. That body was made up of more than 100 international scientists and was backed up by, among others, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. It concluded that there has been a large, sudden and unexpected decrease in the abundance of springtime Antarctic ozone during the past decade. Ozone decreases of more than 50 per cent. in the total column, and 95 per cent. locally between 15 and 20 km altitude have been observed.

Everyone knows about the hole over the Antarctic, but what about other areas? In the northern hemisphere there have been measurable decreases between 1969 and 1986 of ozone ranging from 1·7 to 3 per cent. at latitudes between 30 and 64 deg. The decreases are most pronounced and range from 2·3 to 6·2 per cent. during the winter months. That depletion occurs over densely populated areas, including Britain, Europe, the United States of America, Japan, much of the Soviet Union, China and the middle east. The observed changes may be due wholly or in part to the increased abundance of trace gases, primarily CFCs. Once the CFCs get into the atmosphere, they hang around for 100 years. They will be a danger for a long time.

The scientists say:

"The weight of evidence strongly indicates that man-made chlorine species are primarily responsible for the observed decrease in ozone within the polar vortex."

It is as provable as the link between cigarette smoking and lung cancer and the causes of acid rain.

Summing up all the scientists' comments, Dr. Robert Watson of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration said:

"The mean values of the observed decreases at mid and high latitudes in winter are larger than the mean values of the predicted decreases."

I do not really understand that. He continued:

"Things are far worse than we thought."

I understand that, though. The Government admit that there is a problem. We are worried about the extent to which their actions will solve it.

It is all very well to quote the scientific evidence and technical information, but the reality is that the depletion of the ozone layer will cause skin cancer. The herpes virus, hepatitis and parasitic infections of the skin will increase, as will senile eye cataracts. Significant changes in total column ozone will disturb crop yields. Increases above 10 per cent. of UV-B—the ultra-violet rays that get through the ozone layer—will affect fish. There will be many other consequences, and that is why it is important to regard this as an important issue. It will affect the entire planet and the relationships in the ecosystem. It is not something that does not matter to the British people.

We want the Government to be more decisive in acting to persuade—and if necessary to legislate—industry to stop using CFCs. Of course it cannot be done overnight, but we believe that this protocol does not go far enough. The Government have been guilty of back-pedalling in the EEC. They should assist the British chemical industry by funding research into finding CFC substitutes. Du Pont has discovered such substitutes.

The Government should re-evaluate the reductions required, taking into account the comments of the Ozone Trends Panel and the Toronto conference. We wish to clarify the role of the United Kingdom in pushing for the urgent reconvention of the Montreal protocol and exertion of diplomatic activity to encourage other nations to join the process. The Minister seemed to agree with that proposition.

We wish to clarify the procedures for monitoring implementation of cuts in the United Kingdom and the possibility of aiming for more radical measures similar to those being adopted by the Nordic countries. We must step up research and investment, and we must have legislation to label products and a timetable for bans on non-essential uses of CFCs as soon as alternatives become available.

Mr. Mans: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, in its evidence to the Select Committee, ICI made it clear that extra resources would not speed up the search for alternatives to CFCs?

Mr. Roberts: ICI said that, but I do not necessarily believe it. It is a matter of resources, research and co-operation among the chemical industries of all the developed countries.

The British industry is selling itself short. Its future lies in competing in a world that is worried about the environment, especially the ozone layer. It must carry out the research, develop the alternatives as quickly as possible and get on with the job. ICI and others will take the lead from a Government who seem to be the dirty men of Europe, who do not push or press, who want to drag their coat tails on this issue and who are not as concerned about the environment as they should be. I am concerned about jobs in the British chemical industry and about its future. If the United States—our main competitor—and the British Government sign the international agreements, there should be fair competition to produce alternatives.

The protocol is inadequate. To some extent it is a con, in that it refers to a 50 per cent. cut in consumption but only a 35 per cent. cut in production. Even after the protocol is ratified we shall still produce 65 per cent. of our 1986 production. I hope that the Minister will take the issue seriously and will return from his Department with assurances on legislation, labelling and further action to get international agreement that goes much further than the protocol.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): I am grateful for the opportunity to make what I hope will be a brief contribution to the debate in view of the number of hon. Members who want to participate.

I have two concerns about the Montreal protocol. The first is contained in the developing countries exception. Under the protocol, developing countries are given special rights to produce up to 0·5 kg per head of new production of CFCs and to consume up to 0·3 kg per head. Among those developing countries are the People's Republic of China, which on its own would be permitted to increase world production of CFCs by 50 per cent., and India and Thailand, which would be able to increase production by 0·5 kg per head. Therefore, under the protocol, it is possible to double production of CFCs in 10 years. That is frightening. It makes what we are doing under the protocol look like stubbing out a bookmatch in our backyard while a forest fire rages elsewhere.

I hope that, when the nations again get together to look at the Montreal protocol, they will look not so much at the interests of the developing world in terms of building its industry as at overall world production of CFCs. As the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) rightly said, most of our production is exported. I see no reason why that production should be ignored in terms of world production and should not be substituted for production that would otherwise arise in the developing countries.

My second concern about the protocol relates to the concept—which is rather odd when analysed—of the calculated level index, whereby some CFCs and some halons are worse than others. It applies complex mathematical formulae to the number assigned to each chemical in order to arrive at future production levels. That is fine, until one realises that the original index to which the mathematical formulae apply is a complete mystery. It is just plucked out of the air. In the Montreal protocol, we are multiplying apples and pears and, as any school child knows, to do so is purely fruitless.

The calculated level index is important when we consider controls on production because, however meaningless it is, it is the base on which future changes in production levels can be made. EEC document 4997/88 calls for periodical revision of the indices. The protocol provides for a two-thirds majority of parties to the protocol to be able to make revisions to the indices and for representatives of 50 per cent. of world consumption, not production, who are parties to the protocol, to be able to call for revisions.

As we know, the United Kingdom is low in its use of CFCs. It is high on production and low on consumption. Therefore, in any future revision of the Montreal protocol, if one pools those facts, and pools the majorities, one can see who will come out worst on the deal. Because we are high producers and low consumers, and because of the way in which the majorities under the Montreal convention are structured, inevitably we shall get the short straw. That needs to be examined again on a revision of the convention from the point of view of making sure that the undoubted pain that the industry will go through over the next few years is not unfairly borne in this country.

Much has been said about the speed with which the industry should react. I was very worried by what appeared to be the attitude of the hon. Member for Bootle, who seemed to brush aside the possibility that, because we are dealing with substances that are known to be highly dangerous and we are looking for substitutes, we might rush ahead and produce substitutes, which, because of the chemicals that we are dealing with, could prove far more dangerous than the chemicals that they are designed to replace. The industry is doing everything that it can to produce the chemicals that are needed as quickly as possible. It is already known that the chemicals that are needed as replacements for some industrial purposes are not yet available. If we were just to go blindly ahead and rush into production with the first chemical that was available, we could end up with the industrial equivalent of another Thalidomide disaster.

We must replace CFCs with chemicals that are non-flammable, of low toxicity and have a good thermodynamic performance. For many uses, such as low-temperature refrigeration, those new chemicals are not yet available. The industry is doing everything that it can.

Mr. Allan Roberts: As the Minister and I said, the major use of 60 per cent. of CFCs is for propellants in aerosols. I grant that there are now difficulties with substitutes for the other uses, but there are not for the production of substitutes for propellants in aerosol cans. If that alone were done, it would make a major impact—bigger than that of the protocol.

Mr. Stern: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman, but the British Aerosol Manufacturers Association has already announced that, under present rules, it will be able to reduce use in aerosols to 10 per cent. of the 1976 levels by the end of next year. So the hon. Gentleman is biting on a bullet that does not exist.

The research must be done and the new chemicals found. In this country, we need to use the Montreal protocol and the convention that we are now discussing to encourage the industry to produce what we know it can produce, but at the same time let us not fall into the trap of assuming that it is easy or that there is a quick substitute for any of those uses. There is not.

Mr. Thurnham: My hon. Friend said that this country might suffer disproportionately because we produce more in proportion to our consumption than other countries, but has he reflected on what will happen to the price of the product if restrictions are placed on supply? Perhaps we shall gain in that way.

Mr. Stern: I must leave my hon. Friend to develop that point. I admit that I am concerned more from the point of view of the industry to make sure that it is given the chance of producing the product before it can price it, and from the point of view that there are undoubted dangers in those products, so, as the protocol permits and encourages, we must allow the price levels to reflect the relative toxicities of the products.

Mr. Gordon Oakes (Halton): My hon. Friend the Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) talked about chlorofluorocarbons. The Minister spoke about them, as I shall, as CFCs because it is much too late at night to try to pronounce chlorofluorocarbons.

Hon. Members have talked about chemical substances, CFCs and protocols. Let us try to put the debate, late at night though it is, in perspective by defining the substances that we are discussing. We are talking about everyday substances in products in everyday use in the home. My hon. Friend the Member for Bootle said that 60 per cent. of the product goes into aerosols. I do not know where he got that figure, but I shall accept it.

Increasingly, CFCs are being used in refrigerants. The ordinary refrigerator in the home and refrigerators in shops and abattoirs use them. They are also extensively used in the plastics industry, in which their use is growing. Until a few years ago CFCs were regarded as scientific miracles. They were looked upon as safe products and, as the hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) has said, were economical to manufacture. An important feature of CFCs is that they are non-flammable, while many alternatives, including those in aerosols, are flammable and highly dangerous. CFCs are also non-toxic.

CFCs were regarded as wonder products and in my constituency ICI, which manufactures them, expanded enormously and put tens of millions of pounds into increasing production. Rock Savage in Runcorn in my constituency is the biggest plant in the United Kingdom —and probably the biggest plant in Europe—producing CFCs. I had the privilege three or four years ago of opening an extension to that plant. I was proud to say at that time that it provided jobs for my constituents and exports for Britain. I admit that not many jobs are provided by the direct manufacture of CFCs because this is a highly capital-intensive industry, but many spin-off jobs are provided. There are jobs in administration and sales and in transporting the material and there are jobs in exporting.

A few years ago I was proud of what ICI and Rock Savage were producing for Britain, but then we had the attack, mainly from the United States of America, on CFCs. Suddenly, they were responsible for damage to the ozone layer. That is accepted by the United Kingdom, which is a signatory to the Montreal accord. As the Minister said, it is also accepted by the Soviet bloc and by most countries.

As a result of the ozone layer theory, many things happened. I am not convinced that CFCs are responsible for the hole in the layer over the Antarctic. I am not a scientist, but I have been an officer of the all-party chemical industries group since its existence and I have taken a keen interest in scientific development and in our chemical industry. I think that you too, Mr. Deputy Speaker, were a founder member of the group in 1967. The group is approaching its 21st birthday.

As a trained lawyer, I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Bootle that I do not accept that there is proof to the same extent as the proof that cigarettes damage one's health and lungs that CFCs damage the ozone layer.

Mr. Alan W. Williams (Carmarthen): I should like to quote the words of Dr. Joe Farman, a British scientist and member of the British Antarctic Survey, which discovered the hole in the ozone. Initially, he was very open-minded about the cause of the ozone hole above the Antarctic, and he remained so for several years. However, intensive scientific studies have persuaded him that CFCs are, indeed, the cause, as all the leading scientists agree. He said:

"Debate is over among those competent to judge."

That comes from someone who is uniquely competent to judge. I advise my right hon. Friend to follow world opinion and the opinion of all the leading scientists in this matter.

Mr. Oakes: If hon. Members followed scientists and outside organisations in the hysteria that is sometimes engendered, we should be in a sorry state. Hon. Members should be sceptical of experts, whoever they are. We should apply a little common sense. My hon. Friend the Member for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams) mentioned a member of the British Antarctic Survey, which discovered the hole over the Antarctic a few years ago. That hole could have existed for a million years. No one had looked for it before and no one knew it was there.

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): I am following the right hon. Gentleman's argument closely, and I know that he is putting a layman's or a lawyer's point. Can he tell the House whether a single scientist has suggested that the causes of the problems are other than those that the House is discussing?

Mr. Oakes: I am saying that few scientists would say that there is absolute proof. Scientists say that there is circumstantial evidence, and nations have accepted that. I am not opposing the documents; I am merely advancing my view, which is that we need to have a healthy scepticism. I agree with what a great comedian said on television last Sunday; indeed, I thought that I had invented it. I cannot believe that the fact that I spray deodorant under my arms in my bathroom can have caused a great hole in the ozone layer in the Antarctic. It stretches credulity. Some scientists say that it is so, but we must be sceptical.

As I said, the proposition has been accepted not only by Governments but by the industry. I mention that for one reason. The Minister rightly said that in 1990 there is to be a proper review, on proper evidence, of what is happening. I hope that all nations are continuing their research. I hope that the British Antarctic Survey will continue its research and that in 1990 or 1994, if there is alternative evidence —as there may well be—scientists will say that they have made a mistake. I hope that we shall not crucify a very useful industry on the ground of what may have been a mistake.

There is hope in the documents that the 1990 date can still be achieved if further evidence comes to light between now and then. I hope that the Minister and the House will take that into account.

What worries me is that at first the attack was on aerosols—perhaps rightly, perhaps wrongly; I do not know. The attack will now move on to refrigerants and then, inevitably, to plastics. Any use of CFCs—not only in aerosols—will be regarded as a potential source of danger. Indeed, motions have already appeared on the Order Paper—I have tried to amend them—calling for an immediate ban on aerosols and other uses of CFCs. At the moment, no adequate, economical, non-toxic and non-flammable alternative exists. If we were to use carbon dioxide, for example, as a refrigerant, can we imagine what size our refrigerators would be? If we were to use butane aerosols, there would be an immediate danger of flammability, which we have not got with CFCs.

These documents are reasonable in that they give time for the development of a practical and economic alternative to existing CFCs. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) referred to the excellent briefing that we had from ICI, explaining clearly and openly to hon. Members the current position and what it was doing. Already ICI has begun a massive programme of research in its laboratory at Runcorn and in a pilot plant which is in production at Westbank in Widnes. Funnily enough, that plant is on the site of the old Deacon works, which was one of the first chemical plants in the United Kingdom. The foundation of part of our chemical industry began on the very site where ICI's pilot plant is. It is very close to the Halton chemical museum, of which I am a trustee and which we are working hard to establish as a major chemical museum not only in the United Kingdom but in Europe.

I have seen the pilot plant which is in production. Millions of pounds are being invested by ICI in CFCs which will be non-malign to the environment. Over the next two years £3 million per annum is to be spent on a rapid expansion of the plant. That is a lot of money in investment terms. What about manpower? By 1990, 200 scientists and technicians will be working on this alone.

The hon. Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) talked about the need for speed. I agree with him, as does ICI. One sensible development by ICI to achieve speed is that engineers are working with the chemists now so that there will not be production problems when the product is invented. They are working together now so that the production will flow quickly and evenly when the right product is found.

The research must be centred on CFCs which are ozone-benign. Not all CFCs are malign to the ozone layer. The hon. Member for Bristol, North-West was right when he said that three qualities are needed for the new product: it must have good thermodynamic performance, it must be non-flammable and it must have low toxicity. I agree entirely with him that the new product must be thoroughly tested so that we do not invent a product which could be alleged to be more damaging that the product we already have because of toxicity. That is why ICI honestly and openly in its evidence to the Select Committee said that no matter what the research might be and no matter what expenditure is made, we still come back to the essential problem of the possible toxicity of a new product.

No matter how fast the research goes or how well the production problems can be overcome, proper testing for a safe product will take a minimum of five years. That is only for the testing. Just as drugs have to be tested over a period, so will this product. If it is thought to be all right, after being tested over only 12 months or two years, and there are subsequent defects or harmful consequences, it would not be right for British industry to launch that product on the world. Therefore, a five-year testing period is essential. I say that clearly to the House. It is a crucial element, no less crucial than achieving the maximum possible safety for the public.

I ask the Minister to resist any demands from hon. Members, from organisations or—because one never knows when it will change its mind—from Europe to speed matters even faster, to the detriment of safety.

The documents as drafted will allow that essential research to take place within a feasible time scale. I am convinced that, because of its investment and the dedication of its scientists, technicians and engineers, ICI will find a practical alternative to the existing CFCs and that that alternative will be British.

Mr. Stern: The hon. Gentleman has rightly paid tribute to the work of ICI in this sphere and reference has been made to the work being done by Du Pont. We should, to complete the triangle, mention the work of ISC in my constituency.

Mr. Oakes: The Chinese have an expression about allowing a thousand flowers to bloom. I agree with the hon. Gentleman. But I have seen the work that ICI has been doing and I know how advanced it is. I am proud of that research, and I hope that the future production of the alternative products about which we have been speaking, which will be so useful to mankind, will occur in my constituency, in the birthplace, the first home, the very heartland, of the British chemical industry.

1.2 am

Mr. Hugo Summerson (Walthamstow): I shall cut short my remarks in view of the number of hon. Members who wish to speak in the debate, and concentrate on document 4997/88. There seems to be a discrepancy between what is said in the explanatory memorandum and in the document. The memorandum states:

> "Recent scientific reports on the depletion of the ozone layer over Antarctica in Spring and other studies on the total ozone layer indicate that a reduction in the use of chlorofluorocarbons and halons is appropriate. The use of these substances is thought to be a probable cause for the depletion of the ozone layer."

Note the weasel words in that memorandum, whereas—I am happy to say—the document is more positive, in that it states:

> "Whereas it is established that continued emissions of chlorofluorocarbons and halons at current levels are likely to cause significant damage to the ozone layer; whereas there is international consensus that significant reductions in both production and consumption of all such substances are necessary . . . whereas it is necessary for the protection, promotion and improvement of the environment to conclude the Vienna Convention and its Protocol, which is based on the principle of preventive action to avoid further damage to the ozone layer".

That is the right way to put it. We cannot afford inaction. Even as we speak, more and more of these wretched substances are being pumped into the stratosphere. Production is now running at between 700,000 and 1 million tonnes per annum. Even if that level were reduced, those substances would still be going into the stratosphere, and, as the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) pointed out, once they have undergone the metamorphosis into chlorine, that remains there for 100 years, continuing to do damage.

Much has been said about jobs, and I do not denigrate any of those remarks, but if we end up without an ozone layer, the results will be absolutely horrendous.

Mr. Dalyell: The hon. Gentleman may be right or wrong, but is it not rather important to get at the truth of his assertions? Does he accept that the view of John Pyle —chairman of the Minister's stratosphere ozone layer review group—that Europe urgently needs a research aircraft like the American ER2 to do some basic research, especially over the Arctic, is really the litmus test of whether his assertions and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) are right? The truth is that we do not know yet, and a research aircraft is desperately needed.

Mr. Summerson: We already know a great deal following the American airborne Antarctic ozone experiment, which finished only a month or two ago, but I agree that we need to do more research, especially over the Arctic. An expedition is at present looking into conditions there, but we need to learn more.

There are two important things that the European Community could do to avoid further damage to the ozone layer. First, it should permit no imports of such substances—and, by the same token, permit no exports.

[Mr. Summerson]

Secondly, there should be mandatory labelling of aerosols. Many other things could be done, but I consider those the most important.

Let me conclude by quoting what has been said by Dr. Joe Farman of the British Antarctic Survey. I also take this opportunity of paying tribute to the survey and the important work that it has done: long may it continue. Dr. Farman says:

"Had the delegates at Montreal seen the latest profiles of ozone, chlorine and the like from Antartica, then the cuts in the protocol would probably have been more stringent, and with fewer exceptions allowed. Just what, one may wonder, made it essential for the protocol to be agreed when it was? Was it really concern for the ozone layer? There is a simple test of this. Paragraph ii of Article 2 of the protocol reads: 'Nowithstanding the provisions contained in the Article Parties may take more stringent measures than those required by this article'

I am glad that the Government have done what they have done already, but we need to do much more, and I hope that they will give the lead.

1.6 am

Mrs Ray Michie (Argyll and Bute): I want to make a brief contribution to the debate, which is welcome and well timed in view of the Toronto summit in June. The summit recognised that CFCs are important contributors to the so-called "greenhouse effect" and called for their near-elimination by the year 2000.

The Montreal protocol, as we have heard, seeks a reduction in worldwide CFC production by the end of the century, but most scientists believe that that will not be enough. I urge the Minister to give an international lead and begin negotiations to reduce levels by the 85 per cent. now being called for. We have heard about the Nordic countries, which have announced that they are aiming for reductions of over 90 per cent. by 1995.

No country can tackle the task in isolation, and I was interested to note the Minister's remarks about the attempts to involve more countries in signing the protocol. That is obviously important, but what kind of monitoring will be carried out to ensure that countries that are not party to the protocol do not become havens for CFCs? I agree that all aerosols should be labelled, and we welcome the moves made voluntarily by companies and the British Aerosol Manufacturers Association to label goods. McDonalds is to abandon the use of CFCs when making its fast-food cartons. The general public have also played their part by putting pressure on manufacturers to label goods, but I believe that labelling should be made compulsory.

I too, commend ICI for its work and hope that it will be ahead of the Department in coming up with substitutes for CFCs.

The Government say that they are committed to improvement, especially by means of research. I hope that the Minister will explain what benefits will be gained by shedding 130 scientific posts from the Natural Environment Research Council. It is extremely worrying that so many scientific posts are disappearing in this and other areas. We must move faster in seeking to have CFCs banned altogether from manufacturing, except for medical products.

The situation is so serious that it is essential that we act with real urgency. I know that it is difficult for many to imagine what will happen with further depletion of the ozone layer. There is no doubt, however, that the climate will continue to become warmer. We have already a modern-day dust bowl in the United States. The sea level will rise. We have heard about beaches being eroded in Australia. Research that has been undertaken at Cambridge university shows that British plants and trees have begun to change.

Mr. Stern: The hon. Lady is talking about the greenhouse effect as a certainty, but there is considerable scientific dispute about it. If she is right, does she agree that instead of concerning herself with the minor contribution that CFCs make she should argue for a reduction in the fossil fuel burn, which has an effect five times greater than CFCs? If the hon. Lady is right, the quickest way to deal with the greenhouse effect would be to close the fossil fuel plants and introduce more nuclear power generation.

Mrs. Michie: We must address ourselves to that issue as well, but we are discussing CFCs tonight. I shall confine myself to the motion and the implications that CFCs have on the depletion of the ozone layer.

We would be foolish to ignore what could happen, such as food growth diminishing and fresh water supplies being depleted. Such consequences would increase political instability and the potential for international conflict. Nothing could be more telling than the first sentence of the draft conference statement from Toronto, which reads:

"Humanity is conducting an uncontrolled, globally pervasive experiment whose ultimate consequences could be second only to a global nuclear war."

We must take these issues seriously. I accept what the Minister has said this evening—I am sure that I shall accept what he says when he replies—but I do not accept that we are going far enough or fast enough.

1.13 am

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I was disappointed by the speech of the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts). The right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) said that we must keep an open mind and arrive at decisions in a balanced way, but the hon. Member for Bootle merely read out passages from Select Committee reports and said that he was in virtually complete agreement with them. He did not say where he differed from them. It is obvious that he does not know where he differs from them, which leaves us wondering whether he has any thoughts of his own.

I was especially disappointed when the hon. Member for Bootle failed to congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on achieving the first ever international agreement on the prevention of environmental problems. It is greatly to the credit of the Government, and to the work of my hon. Friend, to have brought the protocol about.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Will the hon, Gentleman give way?

Mr. Thurnham: I do not have time to allow the hon. Gentleman to intervene.

The hon. Member for Bootle did not give credit to the voluntary work that has been done by industry. The aerosol industry has said that it can reduce the use of CFCs by 90 per cent. The packaging industry has said that there will be voluntary phasing out of their use by most of the firms in the retailing industry.

I shall comment briefly on the refrigeration industry, of which I have personal experience. The use of CFCs as refrigerants is only about 11 per cent. of all uses, but the reduction and elimination of harmful CFCs presents a considerable challenge to the industry and there has been a strong and positive response by the trade associations.

My hon. Friend the Minister will be well aware of the work of the Institute of Refrigeration, as he presented the opening address to the helpful, useful and positive conference which was held on 18 May. The British Refrigeration Association has just announced that it is to hold a user group conference on 13 October, and I am sure that that will play a useful part in leading the industry. The Heating and Ventilating Contractors Association has issued a pocket guide, with six dos and six don'ts. Individual firms have also made contributions. We have heard of the work of the three manufacturers of refrigerants. I should like to mention one particular user, Sainsbury, for its work in developing a pressure relief valve with much less leakage than the valves which were used previously.

There has been no mention of the rigid urethane foam manufacturers. Five times as much CFC is used in the insulation in domestic refrigerators as in the refrigeration system itself, so obviously there is scope for searching for new alternatives for insulation.

It has been said that 50 to 75 per cent. of the consumption of CFCs in the refrigeration industry is in the maintenance of existing systems, and that 10 per cent. of the gas in existing systems has to be replaced each year. That represents a major challenge to the maintenance and service industry which has been something of a Cinderella industry in the past, but I am confident that it will respond and follow the lead of the trade associations and large firms in the industry. The HVCA guide will be very useful, and the conference shortly to be held by the British Refrigeration Association has the objective of "establishing voluntary codes of good practice for the care and use of CFC refrigeration in commercial installations, as well as developing responsibly engineered solutions for the future, as acceptable replacements for existing refrigerants are developed."

The lead given by the users will encourage contractors to develop good practices. It is an industry which in the past has not always the dos and donts listed in the HVCA guide, which I am sure will be helpful. But there is a word of warning. If the industry does not respond positively, there is the question of further controls on R22. The 85 per cent. cut mentioned by Opposition Members would have a very serious effect both on the industry and on the people in general who would suffer.

If the hon. Member for Bootle had done more than read the Select Committee report, and had read the Library reference note, he would have seen that any rash further restrictions could lead not only to job losses in this country, but to deprivation in technologies in Third-world countries, and that people's lives could be immediately endangered by too rapid introduction of new, untested products.

The industry must respond positively so that too strict control should not be imposed, in the interests of the protection of the environment, above all. In winding up the debate, I should be interested if my hon. Friend will say what action the Government are taking on some of the problems, such as the scrapping of old fridges and the saving and recycling of some refrigerants.

Perhaps he will have a word with his colleagues in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food about the EC directive on frozen foods which calls for much lower temperatures to be used in that industry and would impose greater burdens on that industry when we are being asked to use less refrigerant. In this country we consume more frozen food per head than in any other country, which is one reason why we should pay more attention to the practical aspects of this convention. The Minister has said that we should strike a balance and that he will be keeping the issues strictly and closely under review, but I am sure that he can expect a good response from the refrigeration industry.

1.19 am

Mr. Alan W. Williams (Carmarthen): I endorse the Government's support for the Montreal protocol, but although these documents are welcome, they do not go far enough. We will have to take this problem must more seriously during the next 10 years.

I am a chemist. Chemistry was my degree subject. Many years ago, while at Oxford, I wrote an essay on the organic compounds of fluorine. I found the subject fascinating. The essay ran to 26 sides of paper, but my speech will be much shorter.

Mr. Allan Roberts: I do not know why my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) is not speaking from the Opposition Front Bench, but he told me that his thesis was on CFCs and that he would lend it to me so that I could read from it.

Mr. Williams: I am afraid that my thesis was on a different subject. I found freons fascinating 25 years ago when I wrote that essay but, 10 years ago, when I was a college lecturer on environmental science, I started to read about the effects of freons and CFCs on the ozone layer. That effect was predicted theoretically before it was discovered practically.

CFCs are almost completely inert. They are non-flammable and non-toxic. It was predicted in the early 1970s that, once they were released, they would persist and could not be broken down or be leached out of the atmosphere by rainwater. It was established that they could be removed only by drifting to the upper reaches of the atmosphere, where they would be broken down by ultra-violet rays and where there was a danger that they would damage the ozone layer.

The prediction alone was enough to persuade the United States to ban aerosols in 1978. Through Dr. Joe Farman in the 1980s, we received evidence of a hole developing in the ozone layer above the Antarctic. It is not a trivial hole, as the right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) suggested. It is massive—it is as big as the United States and as deep as Mount Everest. It appears every year between August and October, and the extent of the ozone depletion grows each year. The ozone concentration today is less than half what it was in the 1970s.

Mr. Moynihan: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. As we are in the last minute of the debate, I should like to put it on record that hon. Members on both sides of the House have raised important issues and I shall write to them in full as soon as possible. If hon. Members who have not caught your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would care to write to me, I shall respond to their arguments as well.

Mr. Williams: I thought that this was an open-ended debate. Anyone who treats this topic lightly does a great disservice to life on the planet, as CFCs——

It being one and half hours after commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question pursuant to Standing Order No. 14 [Exempted Business].

Question agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 8335/87 and 4997/88 + COR1 on control of chlorofluorocarbons and the ozone layer; supports the implementation of the Montreal Protocol through Community-wide action; endorses the control of consumption of ozone-depleting substances through control of their overall supply; and encourages continuing action by all sectors of industry on a voluntary basis to reduce use of these substances to the maximum possible extent.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, notwithstanding the practice of the House as to the intervals between stages of Bills brought in upon Ways and Means Resolutions, more than one stage of the Finance (No. 2) Bill may be taken at any sitting of the House. —[Mr. Lightbown.]

Education (Rochdale)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lightbown.]

1.25 am

Sir Cyril Smith (Rochdale): I am delighted to have the opportunity to fire the first public salvo at national Government level at the proposals now with the Secretary of State for Education and Science to reorganise education in Rochdale—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I hope that if hon. Members wish to discuss matters other than the Adjournment they will do so outside the Chamber.

Sir Cyril Smith: I have no hesitation in urging the Secretary of State to reject the proposals from Rochdale. For the children in my constituency, the proposals will lead to a lowering of standards, a reduction of opportunities and the abolition of choice. What is more, they will do so at an increased cost to the ratepayers.

As I do not consider cost to be the main argument—it is merely a complementary one—I shall deal with it first. Figures ranging from £10 million to £21 million are floating around as representing the cost of reorganisation. Such expenditure inevitably adds up to £1 million a year to the revenue estimates—to educate fewer children in fewer buildings. That extra cost comes not from more books, materials or even teachers, but basically from interest on capital borrowed and the repayment of loan charges.

I said that the scheme now with the Minister was not properly costed—a fact which was openly admitted at a recent public meeting by the chairman of the Rochdale education committee. That leads me to my first important submission. It is extremely doubtful whether the scheme presented to the Minister meets the requirements of procedure laid down in DES guidelines. The proposals are procedurally flawed in other respects, too—most notably in the manner in which the consultation process was practised. No alternative scheme was put before parents in the 12 months before the submission to the Minister. Any alternatives that were put to them were put in 1981 or 1982.

The consultative process was a sham. The authority informed parents; it did not consult. Parents were often denied the right to vote at meetings, and the propaganda issued before the meetings at considerable expense to the ratepayers blatantly promoted only one scheme of education in Rochdale. Such meetings as were held were conducted not at a formative stage of the proposals but after the local education authority was firmly committed. Despite parental objections, no significant changes were made to the plan.

As required by the procedures, the local authority has received a document of objection to the plan from CARE, a spontaneously organised body of parents who formed themselves into a voluntary organisation to promote a campaign against the reorganisation of education—CARE. The organisation has done a superb job, and I commend its objection document to the Minister, who will receive a copy from the local authority. It is quite a substantial document. It is now with the local authority, and I hope that the Minister will ensure that CARE is allowed to see a copy of the authority's reply to it. The Minister will be able to read in the objection document some of the disgusting procedures that went on at some of the so-called consultative meetings. I urge him, on receipt of it, to look at examples of Chawfield, Sidall Moor and Calder hill schools.

The chairman of the education committee in Rochdale, who is paid a salary by one education authority and then released for two or three days a week, on salary, to act as chairman of the Rochdale education authority, with another fee of thousands of pounds, is on record as saying:

"The people who attend the meetings are those who are opposed to the proposals."

Perhaps that explains why parents were not allowed to vote at the meetings that were held. I hope that the Minister will be able to assure me that the objections submitted by CARE will be given full emphasis in his consideration and, further, that he will agree to meet a deputation of the parents, led by me, before a decision on the proposals is taken, presumably in the autumn.

My first submission is that the proposals have resulted from a highly suspect procedure and improper consultation and that they have not been properly costed and do not provide alternatives. I hope that the Minister will duly consider that aspect of the submission.

I was a member of the Rochdale education committee for 23 years, and its chairman for over six years. It has a superb education record. I am not anxious to see that record washed away because of political ideology at worst, and the desire for change, any change, at best. The existing system has much to commend it, and I see no reason to change it. Uniformity of system throughout the borough is not an adequate reason.

Let us look at one school—Calder hill—which has a superb record. I have selected it because all the parents there overwhelmingly rejected the proposals, in another document, which has been sent to the local authority, and which the Secretary of State will also soon receive and be able to read. I hope, again, that the Minister can assure me that that submission, from the staff-parents association at Calder hill school, will have his full consideration, and that the parents from that school will be able to meet him. We would love to welcome the Minister to the school.

The subjects available in the school at fifth and sixth form level number close on 30. The external examination pass rate is well above the national average. There is an open sixth form of 325 students, of whom, last year, 105 went on to the upper sixth. Of those 105, 75 pupils gained entry to various universities and similar institutions to read for degree courses. Seven of those went to Oxford.

That is a wonderful record, and it includes subjects such as business studies, chemistry, creative art, drama, economics, English, Urdu, electronics, geology, history, computer technology, statistics and many others. Despite that record of achievement and that breadth of success, in the proposals submitted to the Minister is the proposal to destroy it. That is an act of sheer criminal vandalism of the worst order.

The total abolition of sixth forms in our schools is the most disgraceful part of the scheme because it denies choice in the future. There are young people at 16 who can best succeed in a college-like discipline, but others need the informal adult, but none the less more formal, sixth form discipline in secondary school. All my experience teaches me that that is a fact. This scheme will deny that choice to all the 16-plus young people wishing to continue in education in Rochdale, because the only choice that will be offered to them will be a tertiary college.

I stress that it is hoped that that tertiary college can be provided at what is now De La Salle training college. Young people from my constituency will be bussed several miles to the site of that college. I stress again that it is hoped that the tertiary college will be there, because, if the site is not obtained by the local education authority, the proposed tertiary college will have to be on a split site, and that would be an even bigger education disaster for the students.

I understand that even if the De La Salle site is obtained, a split site will still be necessary for the proposed tertiary college for up to 10 years. During that interim period the education of 16-plus youngsters will be adversely affected. Those young people—like all other young people—cannot live the years again during which they will have been denied educational opportunity. If De La Salle is not ultimately available, presumably new proposals would again have to be submitted for consultation at local level.

I have used Calder hill as an example, but other schools have excellent sixth forms which can be equally defended and which, too, will be destroyed.

In Rochdale we have the middle school system. Those schools do and have done a superb job. It is a wilful waste of expertise and experience to abandon such a system merely to impose a uniform scheme of an extremely different type. The CARE document excellently argues the case for middle schools, and I again commend it to the Minister's attention. In his consideration he should not overlook the fact that those middle schools do the foundation work of the upper schools.

I understand that last year Her Majesty's inspectorate reported on those middle schools in Rochdale, but the report has not been published. As we have some grounds for having an idea of what that report contains, we welcome the publication of the HMI comments.

The local education authority proposes to establish 12 schools for 11 to 16-year-olds. Six of those schools will fail to reach six-form entry. That is despite the fact that the local education authority's own study showed that a six-form entry school, let alone a smaller one, would be more restricted in the range of options available for individual students.

This is an Adjournment debate, so the clock is always against one. The case against those proposals is overwhelming. I have merely touched on the basic outline of that opposition. I say again that I hope that the Minister will agree to meet us in a few weeks' time for further discussion.

We have a Minister who constantly and publicly declares his belief in parental power. I now urge him to put his money where his mouth is. If he does that, he will reject these proposals because parents wish him to do so. He will reject them because they abolish excellence and choice, because they are economic nonsense, are based on political dogma and ignore what is in the best educational interests of children in my constituency.

The Minister's decision within the last 14 days on Cronkeyshaw primary school in my constituency gave great joy to parents, and I am grateful to him for it, but we have had a stupid reaction from some councillors, who cannot be grateful in defeat—a fact demonstrated by some of them on previous occasions. They are now threatening to punish the children by refusing to repair the roof of the school. I believe that at last week's town council meeting the chairman said that the decision was based, not on educational grounds, but on the personal relationship between the Minister and me. The chairman would have a shock if she saw some of the letters that I have written to the Minister in the past few months.

I warn the Department that it is dealing with a petulant chairman and an authority a few of whose councillors are not in the first flight. One of them joined us recently from West Bromwich or Southampton—somewhere like that. I am sure that the Minister can be relied upon to back his judgment, and that of the parents, and to reject the proposals before him. I join the parents in inviting the Minister to reject those proposals. I commend to him the documents produced by CARE and the parent-teacher association of Calder Hill school, and I look forward to the ongoing dialogue which I am sure the Minister will promise in his reply.

1.41 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Robert Dunn): I congratulate the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Smith) on obtaining this Adjournment debate on the proposed changes to primary and secondary schools, and to first, middle and upper schools, in Rochdale. I am aware that the issue is stimulating much local interest and discussion. I know the area, because I am a native of south-east Lancashire. We are grateful to see in the Chamber, supporting the hon. Member for Rochdale, the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie), and, in support of me, my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Ryder). We have quite an attendance for this Adjournment debate.

On a more personal note, may I say how delighted I was when the hon. Gentleman recently joined the ranks of the knights of the shires. I am sure that it gave him as much pleasure as it gave to his friends on both sides of the Chamber.

Perhaps the most important challenges to the education system in the late 1980s and 1990s are the need to improve standards of achievement among all pupils of all abilities, to improve the quality and range of the curriculum and the effectiveness of its delivery, and to secure the best possible return from the resources that are found for education.

For many schools, internal changes in the organisation of classes or the distribution of teaching duties will be needed. Planning is called for and some hard decisions will need to be taken by local authorities everywhere. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has asked all local education authorities to examine how the education service can provide a more effective response to national and local needs and circumstances, and to undertake systematic reviews of their school provision, area by area.

Although financial considerations are important, above all, local education authorities must take full account of educational considerations when planning changes. New arrangements must offer an education better suited to the needs of pupils of all abilities than the ones that they replace. They must also reflect, wherever possible, parental preferences for schools of particular types. The viability of a school does not depend solely on the number of pupils. It depends on the age range and character of the school, its ethos, the quality and balance of expertise of its teachers and its non-teacher support, links with neighbouring schools, the fitness for purpose of its building and the extent to which all those can be maintained.

That is the background against which the Rochdale LEA has examined school provision within the borough. Let me explain the standard set of procedures that come into play when a local education authority wishes to change the organisation or pattern of provision in its schools. Those procedures are laid down by sections 12 to 16 of the Education Act 1980.

Briefly, the requirements are that when a local education authority or, in certain circumstances, the providers of a voluntary school wish to establish, discontinue or alter the size or character of a school they must publish proposals explaining their intentions. During the two-month period following publication it is open to interested parties to submit objections to the proposals. If such objections are made, if the Secretary of State has given appropriate notice to the local education authority, or if the school concerned is a voluntary school, the proposals fall to the Secretary of State to decide and may not be implemented without his approval.

On 13 April this year the Rochdale education authority and the Manchester diocesan council for education published statutory proposals to replace the existing mixed pattern of primary, first, middle, secondary and upper schools in the borough with a system of primary and secondary schools, with provision for children aged 16 to 19 being made in a tertiary college, as the hon. Gentleman said. I understand that those proposals have attracted a number of objections, which the Rochdale authority will shortly be required to send to us, together with its comments on them.

When the Secretary of State is deciding proposals to reorganise schools, he is under a general duty to act fairly. In other words, he must judge each proposal or set of proposals on its merits, taking into account the arguments of those making the proposals and the views of those objecting to them.

I know that the hon. Gentleman will understand that it is important for the Secretary of State to avoid pre-judging the issues where such proposals are concerned. He will not, therefore, expect me to say anything about the particular reorganisation that is the subject of this debate. I know he will accept my assurance that I have listened carefully to what has been said tonight and that his points will be taken into account, along with any other representations that we may receive before a decision is reached on these proposals.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether I would be prepared to meet deputations about the proposals. He knows that the answer is yes and that I shall be happy to meet deputations when dates and times can be arranged between us. I am conscious of the fact that I have met the hon. Gentleman many times and that our arrangements have always been worked out amicably. I thank him for the tenor and tone of the debate and for the way in which he put forward his arguments on behalf of his constituents, some of whom are much nearer to us than they might have been a little while ago.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eleven minutes to Two o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

North East Shipbuilders Ltd.

1. Mr. Clay: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he has recently met the chairman of British Shipbuilders to discuss North East Shipbuilders Ltd.; and if he will make a statement.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I last saw John Lister on Thursday 7 July. North East Shipbuilders was among the subjects that we discussed.

Mr. Clay: The Minister will be aware that hundreds of lay-offs are to take place in the next few weeks because of the situation at NESL. Does he agree with Mr. Lister, the chairman, that the immediate hope for the yard is the Cuban order? If so, will he immediately give the intervention fund subsidy and suitable credit arrangements, rather than insist on privatisation first? The Minister's insistence and ideological obsession over privatisation are causing uncertainty and delay and could lose the one order that could save the yard. Will he now agree to the intervention fund and let us clinch the Cuban order? We can talk about privatisation and takeover later.

Mr. Clarke: Negotiations are continuing on the Danish contract, but I accept that, because of the unfortunate situation, substantial lay-offs appear to be forthcoming in Sunderland and are likely to take place over the next few weeks.

We do not yet know how much the Cubans would pay for any ships that they bought and we cannot say whether the Cuban order would be likely to occupy all the yards in Sunderland. I made it clear that we would give intervention fund support at an acceptable cost to the taxpayer, but we are not in a position to do that at the moment. It is likely that the proposition will be attractive only if we can find a suitable private sector purchaser.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Has not the nationalised shipbuilding industry lost well over £1 billion over the last decade? Is it not also a fact that the industry's decline in this country from controlling over one third of the world market to controlling just a paltry 1·5 per cent. has been due to excessively high wage demands, thus pricing British shipbuilding out of the world market? Is there not also huge over-capacity in the industry?

Mr. Clarke: The decline has been due to a combination of features, including the last point made by my hon. Friend. There is a vast excess of shipbuilding capacity throughout the world, compared with any likely demand for ships from purchasers. For a variety of reasons, British Shipbuilders has made heavy losses, well above the intervention fund support that European rules allow us to give it. It would be reckless for contracts to be placed in yards on unacceptable terms to the taxpayer, with the likelihood that the British taxpayer would pay more than the Cuban for the resulting ships.

Mr. Beith: Does the Minister realise that the industry has been hugely slimmed down and that what remains of shipbuilding skills on the Wear and the Tyne is of great potential importance to this country? It would be industrial vandalism if the Minister did not safeguard the industry's future either in this case—as he does not appear to be doing sufficiently—or in the case of the Tyne, after the order announced on Monday.

Mr. Clarke: Some shipbuilding is doing extremely well. The order won by Yarrow earlier this week was very good news on Clydeside. The shipbuilding industry is slimmed down, as it is in the rest of western Europe and the far east. The yards that will survive are those that have realistic prospects of continuing to find customers at an acceptable cost to the taxpayer. The taxpayer has proved his willingness to put money into British Shipbuilders when there is a worthwhile proposition to pursue.

Mr. Gould: Is the Minister aware that if, for reasons of dogma and because the yard is in public ownership, he refuses to provide intervention fund assistance and, as a consequence, the Cuban order is lost and the yard has to close, he will not be forgiven for that act of vandalism? Would it not make sense to secure the order first and then decide the question of ownership, if the Government's obsession with privatisation dictates that that is a real question? May we have an assurance from the Minister that the House will have an opportunity to call him to account for his part in this quite unnecessary drama before the House rises for the summer recess?

Mr. Clarke: The Cubans have not yet placed an order and no price has been negotiated with them for those ships. If the Cuban order were obtained, it would not occupy the whole yard at Sunderland. My reservations about the prospects for the Cuban order are based, not on dogma, but on the fact that the last time British Shipbuilders built ships for Cuba it lost between 12 and 17 per cent. on the cost over and above the intervention fund support that we then gave for that order. I know that the Labour Government went in for a notorious Polish ship deal shortly before the 1979 election. The Government have poured money into British Shipbuilders, but we must do so on a common sense basis when we know what the cost is likely to be.

North-West

2. Mr. Butler: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the role and extent of foreign investment in the economy of the north-west.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry (Mr. Robert Atkins): There are over 600 overseas owned firms operating in the north-west, making a major contribution to the region's employment and output. In addition, as elsewhere in the United Kingdom, new inward investment brings wider benefits through innovation in products, technologies and management practices, as well as generating additional demand for local sub-contractors and component suppliers.

Mr. Butler: With 75 American companies in Warrington-Runcorn alone, does that not provide much-needed employment and wealth in the north-west, and should that not be encouraged rather than narrow mindedly dismissed?

Mr. Atkins: My hon. Friend is, as ever, right in drawing attention to the fact that the north-west is a success story. In particular, Warrington-Runcorn in his constituency is the jewel in that success story. I congratulate him on the work that he has done to encourage further investment in that area.

Mr. James Lamond: If the Minister is so keen on inward investment, why does he not give a little more encouragement to initiatives such as that taken by Oldham metropolitan borough council, which is organising a trade mission to China, but which has received little support from the Government despite the desperate need to bring investment and jobs to the area?

Mr. Atkins: As a senior and distinguished Opposition Member, the hon. Gentleman will know that the organisation called INWARD is well involved in encouraging inward investment in Britain. It is not difficult to go to China to encourage inward investment. Preston borough council, which is also Labour-controlled, recently sent a delegation to do just that. If the hon. Gentleman has particular difficulties in relation to Oldham with which I am not immediately familiar, and he cares to write to me, I shall be more than happy to look into the possibilities to which he draws attention.

Mr. Burt: My hon. Friend will be aware that foreign investment brings greater employment. He may also be aware that unemployment in my constituency is now down to about 7·5 per cent. Does he agree that if Opposition Members truly wish to encourage more enterprise and jobs in the north-west they should concentrate on talking about the positive aspects of the north-west, instead of the negative, which they so often portray?

Mr. Atkins: My hon. Friend is right. The north-west is booming at the moment. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have plenty of examples to demonstrate that fact. If the Opposition drew the same attention to it as do my hon. Friend and many of my other hon. Friends from the north-west, the virtues and strengths of the north-west could provide an even better future.

Mr. Alton: Is not a properly trained and skilled work force one of the keys to attracting more inward investment to the north-west? Therefore, does the Minister agree that it will be disadvantageous to our prospects of attracting new industry if the employment training initiatives are turned away by some local authorities in the north-west, particularly Liverpool, where some £30 million-worth of Government funds and some 16,000 employment training places are at risk as a result of the turning away of training opportunities?

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Gentleman makes an excellent point in his own way. I do not have particular responsibility for the training initiative, but the hon. Gentleman is right. I and many other Members of Parliament from the north-west think that the work force there is one of the best and most flexible in Britain. Given the right training, management and encouragement, it can do anything that it sets out to achieve.

Post Office Counters

4. Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he expects to respond to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report on Post Office Counters.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Post Office will be producing an initial response to the findings of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission within three to four months of the date of publication of the report. I will then consider that response and report to the House.

Mr. Marshall: Does the Chancellor accept that there is wide scope for the expansion of services at Post Office Counters within existing services and in the provision of new facilities? Why does he not welcome such initiative and enterprise by the public sector, as he would undoubtedly do if the same enterprise and initiative were being shown by the private sector?

Mr. Clarke: I hope to have a further discussion with the chairman of the Post Office and some of his colleagues about that very subject this afternoon if other matters do not intervene and delay the meeting. We accept that it is right for the management of counters to take a more commercial approach and look for other activities which may be brought into the Counters business. We must ensure that the result will be fair competition with other private sector competitors and that we are not needlessly extending the Post Office, with its cross subsidy, into areas where that is not necessary.

Mr. Key: As my right hon. and learned Friend will no doubt be aware, there is considerable concern in rural areas about Post Office Counters management of rural sub-post offices. Does he agree that the only way to ensure that sub-post offices continue to exist is for people to use those sub-post offices and the village shop usually associated with them? Will he also agree that it would be helpful if new initiatives could be taken, like that at Laverstock near Salisbury, where the local pub has taken on the business of the sub-post office?

Mr. Clarke: The Government are entirely committed to the maintenance of the sub-post office network in rural areas. I have a rural constituency and I agree that it is right to remind the residents of villages that they should use the local post office and associated store if they want it to remain. We are constantly on the lookout for imaginative ways in which to strengthen the rural sub-post office network. Anything that increases the prospect of the network's survival will be welcome.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Chancellor of the Duchy aware that many years ago the Prime Minister used to work in a little shop in Grantham in which cross-subsidisation used to take place? That shop was owned by Alderman Roberts, who did not believe in Sunday trading——

Mr. Speaker: Order. But was it a post office?

Mr. Skinner: Yes. In the corner of that little entrepreneurial outfit there was a post office. In those days the Prime Minister, along with her father, used to believe in the public sector and milked it if necessary.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman has studied the biography of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister more closely than I have. Off the cuff I am not sure whether Alderman Roberts ran a sub-post office. I know that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, together with other members of the Government, is committed to the maintenance of the sub-post office network. We are encouraging the Post Office to take a more commercial view of the management of the network, which will enhance the prospects and future of all the offices.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the Post Office's insistence that a rural post office should be a full mile from another post office can be unduly restrictive and cause hardship? For example, at Cabus in my constituency the only suitable premises, a newsagents, is 0·8 of a mile from the nearest post office, but many elderly people must struggle a long distance to get to the existing post office. Will he consider bringing the problem of the mile restriction to the attention of those who run the counter services?

Mr. Clarke: Depending on events, I might have the opportunity to raise that matter with the chairman of the Post Office this afternoon. It is a matter for him. I am sure that he will take steps to ensure that sensible rules are applied which improve the prospect of survival of rural post offices and their continued contribution to the network.

Mr. Stott: The Chancellor of the Duchy will be aware that among the largest customers of the Post Office counter services are the 2 million people with individual Girobank accounts. In addition, Girobank has large corporate accounts which also use the post office counters. Recipients of DHSS pay and unemployment benefit also use the counters. Will the right hon. Gentleman give an absolute guarantee that whoever buys Girobank when it is privatised will honour the five-year contract that the Post Office board has negotiated with Girobank for the continued use of Post Office Counters?

Mr. Clarke: Yes, I will. Any purchaser will be bound by the contract that has been freely negotiated between the Counters business and Girobank.

Sir Anthony Grant: When my right hon. and learned Friend meets the chairman of the Post Office, will he raise the subject of security for the people who work in sub-post offices, who are at risk from criminal assaults? In my constituency there have been the most appalling attacks on sub-post offices in the rural areas, one of which involved a most horrific murder.

Mr. Clarke: Again, I will undertake to raise that point with the chairman. That is a serious problem for the Post Office, because sometimes substantial sums of cash are handled in quite remote rural areas and the Post Office must help sub-postmasters to protect themselves against risk.

Manufactured Goods

5. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the latest balance of trade in manufactured goods.

9. Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the cumulative trade deficit in manufactures so far in 1988.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Alan Clark): In the five months ended May, there was an estimated deficit on trade in manufactures of £5·2 billion.

Mr. Canavan: What excuse does the Minister have this month for the ever-worsening deficit in manufactures and the worst-ever deficit in overall trade? As the official Budget forecast of a £4 billion overall trade deficit by the end of this year has already been exceeded, is it not about time the Government gave us a revised estimate, or are they too ashamed to admit that their's is the most deplorable record of any Government in history?

Mr. Clark: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated that he will issue a revised estimate. Over 70 per cent. of the deficit is accounted for by increased consumer spending. That is a function of high earnings and a raised standard of living. We know that the Labour party objects to that and that it lost the last three general elections.

Mr. Allen: The Minister will be aware that his manufacturing industry policies have decimated manufacturing in Nottingham, North. There have been job losses at Plessey, Boots, Raleigh, Players, and the closure of Thorn EMI and three neighbouring pits. Are they what the Minister would call the problems of success? When will unemployment in my constituency of Nottingham, North be reduced to 1979 levels?

Mr. Clark: The decimation of manufacturing industry is a pure myth. Since 1981 our share of world trade has remained absolutely constant, and world trade continues to expand.

Mr. Roger King: Does my hon. Friend agree that British manufacturing has never been in a finer state? The magnificent order that British Aerospace won with Saudi Arabia, for a huge sum in the region of £15 billion, is further evidence that we are producing the finest products at the right price to do the job that people want.

Mr. Clark: My hon. Friend is entirely right. Further testimony to the vigour of British manufacturing industry is offered by the readiness of foreign private sector capital to come here and start manufacturing operations. That point was made by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the Leader of the Opposition only last week, just before he ran away to Africa for a fortnight's holiday.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does my hon. Friend accept that it is undoubtedly true that British manufacturing industry is now doing better at home than it has done for many a long year? However, companies such as British Aerospace, Jaguar, Plessey and many others are finding their margins being squeezed because of the high rate of the pound. We must not go back to the days when we thought that a high pound was good for the country. We need a competitive pound, so that industry can export and compete with foreign manufacturers.

Mr. Clark: I do not know what my hon. Friend means by "competitive pound". The only solution that the Labour party has ever offered to that synthetic problem is continuously to depreciate the exchange rate. The most successful exporting countries are those that have the strongest exchange rates.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: What will the £5·2 billion deficit be at an annualised rate? What will be the consequences for British manufacturing industry of the massive deflation that is now beginning?

Mr. Clark: I have already told the House that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will issue a new forecast. Why does the hon. Gentleman not have the honesty to recommend to the House the Socialist solution to the gap, which is the return of exchange controls and import controls, with all that they mean for confidence in investment and consumer choice?

COCOM Control List

6. Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he plans any new initiatives to reduce and simplify the COCOM control list.

Mr. Alan Clark: Senior officials from COCOM member countries met last January and agreed steps to streamline control lists and improve the general effectiveness of COCOM. Work on the implementation of those steps continues.

Mr. Atkinson: Is my hon. Friend aware of the dramatic increase in American high technology exports to the Soviet bloc? Does he accept, from the evidence that I recently sent him of the experience of my constituent, Mr. Andrew Kuzan, who is now in an American gaol, that United States customs officials are not adverse to setting up and entrapping British exporters of equipment that is now obsolete but which remains on the COCOM list? Will he raise that matter with his American COCOM colleagues as soon as possible?

Mr. Clark: The particular case that my hon. Friend raises is still under investigation. I agree with him that there are elements within it that seem unsatisfactory. However, as both he and the House know, because I have said this before, the Government are anxious to reduce the scope and impact of the COCOM list. We have introduced a rolling review whereby one half of the list is examined in two parts every year, and we have had some success in deleting certain items from it.

Mr. Dalyell: Which are the "unsatisfactory" elements?

Mr. Clark: One must always be on one's guard that an international agreement is not manipulated by interested parties to gain commercial advantage at the expense of other parties who are more scrupulous in their observation of it.

Mr. Hind: Does my hon. Friend agree—[HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] I am not reading. Does my hon. Friend agree that when exporting electronic goods to the Soviet Union, and importing them from the Soviet Union into Europe, we must safeguard against dumping of such goods by the Soviet Union? One lesson to be learnt by British and European manufacturers is that they should make full use of the European Court to prevent such dumping.

Mr. Clark: There is something in what my hon. Friend says, but the question of dumping is entirely separate from strategic considerations affecting items included on the COCOM list and their export.

Regional Industrial Activity

7. Mr. Murphy: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he has any plans to introduce new measures to increase industrial activity in Britain's regions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My Department's enterprise initiative, launched earlier this year, is specifically designed to encourage enterprise and economic growth in all parts of the country.

Mr. Murphy: Bearing in mind that we now have the lowest and least generous industrial regional incentives for many years, with the completion of the Channel tunnel and the introduction of the single European market in 1992, will not south-east England become even more congested and overheated at the expense of other regions?

Mr. Clarke: Too many people in the regions place excessive emphasis on automatic subsidies to capital investment as an instrument of regional policy. We have abandoned the automatic regional development grant and are making very good use of selective regional assistance in order to encourage firms that would not otherwise become involved. In south Wales, the Valleys initiative of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is giving a further boost to development there. South Wales is one of the parts of the United Kingdom that are reviving most strongly, with a very encouraging level of investment, many new jobs and steadily declining unemployment.

Mr. Batiste: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that one of the most effective ways of encouraging regional industrial development is by improving the transport infrastructure available to industry? Does he further agree that the biggest boost he can give west Yorkshire industry at the moment is to support the creation of a freight depot at Stourton and rapid transit from it, through the Channel tunnel, into Europe?

Mr. Clarke: I shall certainly draw that point to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, because I agree that the right transport infrastructure is essential. One thing that has happened is that northern England's economy has revived so rapidly that all of us can see the result of that in traffic congestion. There is a great demand for more railway freight services, and we must rapidly respond to it.

Dr. Reid: Do not the Scottish steelworks make a major contribution to industrial activity? I put to the Minister the point that I made yesterday. The House has been misled by discrepancies in statements made by the Minister and by Sir Robert Scholey. Will the Minister take the opportunity today to make sure that the House is no longer misled, and will he confirm or deny Sir Robert's assertion that, some time ago, the Government were advised by him of the "probability"—I use Sir Robert's word—of the closure of the hot strip mill at Ravenscraig? If that information was given to the Minister, why was it suppressed and not given to the House of Commons in the past few months?

Mr. Clarke: I have looked again at what I said in December, and at what Sir Robert Scholey said. I can see no inconsistency, and I do not understand what all the fuss is about in Scotland. In December I gave the House the forecast of the British Steel Corporation that, subject to market conditions, there was a continuing need for steel to be made at Ravenscraig for at least the next seven years. I also told the House that there was a problem with hot strip mill capacity, and that I therefore could not say the same about the hot strip mill, but that it would certainly be required until the end of this year. After that, as I made clear, everything will depend on market conditions. It is for the chairman and management of BSC to make their judgments about those conditions. As far as I am aware, BSC has as yet made no plans about the hot strip mill, and I do not imagine that it will do so until it sees the state of the market next year.

Mr. Oppenheim: Surely the best new measure for the regions would be to alter the employment policy of the Transport and General Workers Union, which seems to put employment in the prosperous south-east above jobs for the unemployed in Dundee—although Opposition Members still seem keen to accept the union's sponsorship.

Mr. Clarke: I would add to my hon. Friend's legitimate complaint the union's entirely irresponsible attitude towards the Government's employment training schemes for the unemployed. It seems only too anxious to frustrate the Government's concern to help the unemployed to obtain the new jobs that we are creating. I should have thought that it is only the union's role as a kingmaker in the Labour party that stops it being denounced by more people on that side.

Dr. Godman: Industrial activity in my region of Scotland would be enhanced if the Government responded sympathetically to the floating hotel project being negotiated by Scott Lithgow. What is the present state of the negotiations with the Department of Trade and Industry?

Mr. Clarke: I can add nothing to what the hon. Gentleman already knows. We have well-established rules applying to shipbuilding projects, under which intervention fund support is available to certain yards and always has been. We also insist that any Government support must be based on economic common sense and at a price acceptable to the taxpayer. As far as I am aware, no negotiations on the Scott Lithgow project have yet come to a head.

Mr. Sackville: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the economic attractions of the north-west have never been greater, and that the massive investment in fibreglass making by Pittsburgh Plate Glass near Hindley Green is a good example of an American company realising that? Does he agree that the only thing likely to stop that favourable trend is the emergence of further loony Leftism among local councils?

Mr. Clarke: I am glad to say that my Department gave considerable help to Pittsburgh Plate Glass. I agree about the attractions of the north-west, where we find that the take-up of the new enterprise initiative is higher than would be expected. In view of the number of eligible firms, there is a great deal of inward investment. We need to get rid of the last councils that remain hostile to this kind of investment and take foolish actions that discourage investors from coming in.

Mr. Salmond: Would the Minister care to address the impact of the dismemberment of Ravenscraig, on industrial activity? How can he argue that the continuing anti-Ravenscraig bias shown by Sir Robert Scholey is in any way compatible with his claim that Ravenscraig is somehow in genuine competition with other steel plants? Does the Minister really believe that, through privatisation, the Government can wash their hands of such a disgraceful betrayal?

Mr. Clarke: I can never understand why Scottish interests so often lead to descriptions such as "the dismemberment of Ravenscraig" when nothing of the kind has happened. In December I gave a careful assessment based on British Steel's own forecasts of its needs and of the market place. That made our position clear, and nothing has changed since then. We can say only that the future of the hot strip mill is guaranteed until the end of this year. Thereafter it must depend on the market place and on British Steel's need to provide hot strip products in the most cost-effective and competitive way.

Mr. Watts: Does my right hon. and learned Freind agree that the upward trend in imports of capital goods, which accounted for nearly all the deficit last month and which adds to our productive capacity, is the best way in which our industry can expand to meet the great demand that is currently being met by imports, and that it will spread industrial prosperity through the region?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend. Much of the deficit to which my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade referred a moment ago is accounted for by imports of capital goods, which are part of industry's investment. Many consumer imports are attracted here by the growth of our market. There is nothing to worry about in that deficit, much of which is the inevitable result of the continued expansion of this country's economy. In the old days the trade deficit was based largely on public sector deficits, which is why they caused so much more concern than this deficit ought to cause now.

Mr. Caborn: Has the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had time to read the latest publication of the Institute of Civil Engineers, which deals with urban regeneration? If so, does he agree that, like many other reports from both academic and professional bodies, it suggests that there is now a real call for planning and regional co-ordination, something which this Government have not done?

As the Minister responsible for the inner cities and the regions, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman tell the House what lead is given by the Government in moving their Departments to the regions and encouraging research establishments to locate in the regions? So far as the regions are concerned, what input has the right hon. and learned Gentleman had in the work of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, which has been of real concern to many in the north? Will he now deal with industrial regeneration and stop playing about with the cosmetics and with glossy pamphlets?

Mr. Clarke: There has not only been a great deal of co-ordination, but a great deal of decision-making and action in relation to urban regeneration. The hon. Gentleman could visit many of our major cities in which he would see the physical and other signs of the revivals that are taking place in our inner-city areas.

I agree that the costs of maintaining such a large Civil Service in London will inevitably lead to sensible decisions to relocate parts of the Government machine outside London. Indeed, that is being done and I expect the majority of my Department of Trade and Industry to be located outside London shortly, the major move being that of the Patent Office to Newport in south Wales. I know that other Departments are contemplating similar moves.

On the question of industrial activity, we have already described the way in which industrial investment is going to south Wales, the north-west and other parts of the country. The forecasts of the Confederation of British Industry for manufacturing investment in this country are extremely high and expect a growth of about 18 per cent. this year, with continued growth in investment into 1989.

Transport (Inner Cities)

10. Mr. Dickens: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions he has held concerning transport in relation to inner city policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: Inner city transport is, of course, a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, but transport issues are raised from time to time in discussions I have with inner city business men.

Mr. Dickens: Will my hon. Friend concede that the infrastructure of the north-west is second to none in the United Kingdom and that, coupled with many other excellent qualities, that wonderful infrastructure is attracting inward investment to the north-west and to towns such as Oldham and Rochdale? Will he also concede that many companies—not only international companies, but many from the expensive south—are coming to the north-west, an area which historically has always produced the lion's share of the wealth of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Atkins: My hon. Friend makes his case perhaps better than I could. As a fellow north-west Member of Parliament, I can only agree exactly with what he has said. We have a superb infrastructure and there is every reason why not only the transport successes of the north-west but its many other successes will continue to attract many people to the north-west, which, as he rightly says, is the jewel in the crown of manufacturing in this country.

Mr. Morley: Does the Minister accept that transport of any kind is important for industrial development, and that in that sense the A1 and M1 can no longer cope with the desired capacity of traffic and there is a need to extend the M11 up to the north-east, across the Humber bridge? Does he also accept that it would help the development of the region to abolish estuary tolls in general, and those on the Humber bridge in particular?

Mr. Atkins: The matters that the hon. Gentleman raises are largely for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. We are in constant touch with our colleagues in that Department to make them aware of the necessity for industry and commerce to use the roads to a greater extent. Obviously, the Department will have to examine the pressures on those roads in the normal course of events.

Airbus A320

11. Mr. Forth: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will give details of the manufacturing technology employed in the production of the Airbus A320.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The latest developments in materials and manufacturing technology are employed on Airbus production to achieve benefits in terms of costs, weight, strength and ease of manufacture.

Mr. Forth: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that helpful answer. Will he expand on it and tell the House whether he is satisfied that progress is being made on achieving more effective control over the manufacturing process of that product, given that it is spread over a number of different locations? Can he respond to the recent investigations into the production process of Airbus and give us some encouraging news about cost control and increased future competitiveness?

Mr. Clarke: Every time that I have attended an Airbus Ministers' meeting I have pressed the case for better management and financial control of the Airbus project. I believe that the four partner Governments and the four partner companies are broadly agreed. We have endorsed the report that we commissioned from the so-called four wise men—one leading industrialist from each of the four countries. We have another meeting in September, when I hope that the companies will report to us on progress and confirm that they intend to set up new and much better methods of running the project by 1 January next year.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the fly-by-wire technology employed on the A320 is not only the most advanced in the world, and has contributed to the fact that that aircraft received the most advance orders of any civil aircraft since the war, but that it was British-inspired? Does he further agree that the decision of British Airways to put the A320 back into service shortly after the recent crash fully confirmed the technological safety of that system and that all passengers should be reassured that the technology is well proven, sound and tested?

Mr. Clarke: The A320 is certainly the market leader in its field. I agree that it has the most advanced technology of any of its competitors. The Airbus products are the next generation of aeroplanes, and some of its competitors are still producing face-lifted versions of older aeroplanes using older technology. We are awaiting the inspectors' report on the tragic French accident. I cannot possibly anticipate that, but I share my hon. Friend's confidence that it is likely to prove that the technology of the aircraft is as safe and spectactular as we believe it to be.

Mr. Dalyell: Could the curious among us be told what factors led the Minister to take the initiative in talking to the management about management control? Is that not rather unusual? It may be justified, but will he explain to the House why he did it?

Mr. Clarke: The Government do not believe that the best way to build a modern technological product is by having the management in the hands of what is, in effect, an enormous committee of four Ministers from four different Governments and representatives of four different companies, all collaborating in partnership with a selling organisation based in France and detached from the remainder of the management. We want a new management structure, but I can reassure the hon. Gentleman that it is not my intention that I or any other Minister should take over commercial management decisions. We want managers to take those decisions, and we want the managers to have the right authority and the right information to run the project in the ordinary way.

Industrial Lasers

12. Mr. Marlow: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what assessment he has made of the potential market for industrial lasers; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs (Mr. John Butcher): The Department commissioned a study of the industrial laser sector in 1986 and has access to assessments made under Eurolaser, the Eureka programme, to promote the development of high power lasers and their use for materials processing in manufacturing industry. However, it is principally for industry to assess the market potential for industrial lasers.

Mr. Marlow: I thank my hon. Friend for that wideranging, full and eloquently delivered answer. Has he the statistics with which he could illuminate the statement that he has just made?

Mr. Butcher: Yes, Sir. About £260 million was assessed as the total market for industrial lasers two years ago. I am advised that that is growing by about 18 per cent. per annum.

Northern Region

13. Ms. Quin: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he will next be visiting the Northern council of the Confederation of British Industry to discuss industrial progress in the northern region.

Mr. Atkins: I have no present plans to visit the northern council of the CBI, although I regularly meet northern businesses. During my most recent visit to the region I was encouraged to hear business people themselves confirming the report of industrial progress and prospects for further growth which have figured in successive CBI surveys.

Ms. Quin: Will the Minister seek an urgent meeting with both sides of industry in the north to discuss the proposed closure of Marconi Radar in my constituency? Does he agree that the loss of 450 high-quality jobs such as those, and the decision by Marconi to concentrate production in the south-east, represent a trend opposite to what we wish to see? What action will he take to ensure that the jobs are not lost to the northern region?

Mr. Atkins: I am extremely concerned to hear that Marconi has decided to reduce or close capacity at Gateshead and Chelmsford. However, those are matters for the company management, which is best placed to judge the market, or lack of it, for particular products.

Mr. Holt: Does my hon. Friend agree that if he goes to the north-east to meet the northern council of the CBI, the Northern Regional Association of Councils or the Teesside chamber of commerce in my area, he will find nothing but expansion, growing job expectations, declining unemployment and the regeneration of the area improving day after day?

Mr. Atkins: My hon. Friend does his area and region a great service by never ceasing to tell us how strongly and how importantly the north-east features in the scheme of things. My hon. Friend is right to say that, although there are still difficulties in the north-east, things are improving. Opposition Members would do better to talk about the successes, rather than continually talking about the weaknesses.

Mr. Radice: May I remind the Minister of the acute shortage of large-scale factory space in the northern region? Can he tell the House what measures he will take to bridge that gap, thereby not holding back the recovery in the northern economy and helping us replace the jobs that have been tragically lost at Marconi and those that will be lost at Swan Hunter as a result of the announcement the day before yesterday?

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Gentleman and many of his colleagues have rightly and understandably raised the problem of the shortage of factory space in the north-east. He will know that when I answered the Adjournment debate that he raised in the House I said that that was a problem of success. I have received a number of representations and contributions, not least from the hon. Gentleman, whose paper we are considering, and I have discussed the matter, together with my right hon. and noble Friends, with English Estates. We hope to be able to tell the House a little more about progress in the not too distant future.

Mr. Cran: Is my hon. Friend aware that if he consults the regional reports of all the councils of the CBI for the past year, including that for the northern region, he will find that they are couched in terms of unremitting confidence and that the only problems they outline are those associated with growth, such as temporary shortages of labour and so on?

Mr. Atkins: My hon. Friend is quite right. There are things happening in the north-east and the northern region that are extremely good for the local and national economy. We have to ensure that that success is built upon. The problems to which hon. Members have referred, such as the shortage of factory space, have to be addressed. I repeat that that, ironically, is a problem of success.

Industrial Competitiveness

14. Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how he measures changes in the competitiveness of British industry in the last year; and what comparative information he has for West Germany.

Mr. Butcher: A variety of factors affect the competitiveness of British industry. Price and non-price factors are both important and there is no single measure of competitiveness.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Minister accept that we are now at least 10 per cent., and probably 15 per cent., less competitive than the West Germans than we were at the beginning of last year? When will Government policy on exchange rates and interest rates do something to help rather than hinder British industry?

Mr. Butcher: As has been said, an appreciating currency has been a trend that German manufacturers have coped with brilliantly over the past two and a half decades. They have concentrated on non-price as well as price factors, and we should do the same. They have concentrated on things such as quality, design, marketing and so on. The hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong. If we take an independent measure from the IMF, which incorporates movements in exchange rates, productivity and labour costs, we find that on an index of 100 the United Kingdom, compared to West Germany, was at 112 in 1981, 93 in 1984, moving down to 79·6 in 1986 and 72·2 in 1987. Our productivity is improving in great measure.

Mr. Dykes: Jaguar's motor car production is about 49,000 cars. Is my hon. Friend aware that, in Germany, BMW alone produces 490,000 vehicles? Is not one of the ominous realities that, despite the welcome recovery, we remain a low-output economy in leading manufacturing sectors? As my hon. Friend has attested, the Germans have managed with a high-currency policy to build up their industry and output, mainly through massive investment in new assets and innovation in high technology. When is my hon. Friend confident that we shall be able to do the same? Will he join me in setting a target of overtaking Germany, and how many years does he think that that will take?

Mr. Butcher: I ask my hon. Friend to study the policies that were the foundations for the German economic miracle. He should look at the three principles of those policies, which were put together by Euchen and Erhardt, and he will find strong parallels with British domestic policies today.

Mr. Cousins: Is the Minister's complacency not shaken by the fact that industrial production in engineering has fallen by 2 per cent. in the first three months of this year? Does he not realise that it will take us 25 years to catch up with Japan in the number of industrial robots that we have? Is he not aware that in advanced technology industries we fall further and further behind, as was instanced by the closure of Marconi Radar in Gateshead a day ago?

Mr. Butcher: No, I do not accept that for a moment. At long last British industry is showing a real return on capital. There are very healthy trends in investment programmes in crucial sectors. We are hauling in on the lead of some of our major international competitors. To catch up with Germany, we would need to grow at a faster rate than Germany well into the 1990s. I consider that to be a legitimate objective. If we continue with current policies, what has been mooted as a British economic miracle can happen.

Barlow Clowes

15. Mr. Day: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will undertake to compensate investors in Barlow Clowes at an early date in respect of any responsibility borne by his Department which may be discovered in the course of the current investigation.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs (Mr. Francis Maude): It would be wrong for me to prejudge the outcome of the consideration my right hon. and noble Friend and I shall give to the Barlow Clowes case, including the report of Sir Godfray Le Quesne's inquiry into the facts.

Mr. Day: Is my hon. Friend aware that in 1983, following the intervention of the parliamentary ombudsman in the case of the collapse of Langford Scott—a holder of a Department of Trade and Industry licence, which was a key element in the ombudsman's recommendations that the DTI pay compensation—his Department did, indeed, pay compensation? Will he take account of that precedent in dealing with the case of Barlow Clowes?

Mr. Maude: I am aware of the case to which my hon. Friend referred, but he will understand as well as anyone that no two cases are the same. I do not think that I can add to what I have already said. We shall have to await the outcome of the report and consider what to do then.

Mr. Alfred Morris: Has the Minister read the ombudsman's comments to me on this major scandal? Is he still satisfied that a Department of Trade and Industry inquiry is enough, when at least one other Department may be involved in the scandal? More important still, can he tell me what immediate help he can offer my constituent, Leslie Mullard, who, in his mid-70s, has lost his life savings?

Mr. Maude: The Parliamentary Commissioner has felt unable to comment on the terms of his correspondence with the right hon. Gentleman, as it was written to the right hon. Gentleman in confidence. I was surprised to read reports in today's newspapers that the Parliamentary Commissioner had felt able to conclude that there was an apparent case of maladministration for my Department to answer. I gather that he has since clarified his views in a statement issued earlier today. He stressed that any decision that an investigation is warranted in principle in no way indicates a view as to the merits of the case. Indeed, it could not possibly do so. The Parliamentary Commissioner had not been in contact with my Department at all and the statements by Ministers on which he is reported to have based his view carried no implication of maladministration. It is entirely a matter for the Parliamentary Commissioner whether he investigates individual cases. He is not in any way inhibited from undertaking his own investigation by the independent inquiry that is being undertaken by Sir Godfray Le Quesne.

Mr. Redwood: Is my hon. Friend aware that several leading financial institutions wrote letters to many people encouraging them to invest in Barlow Clowes? Is he further aware that one of my constituents received a letter from the head of marketing of Age Concern, which gave him considerable comfort in becoming an investor in that organisation? Will my hon. Friend give a pledge that the DTI inquiry will look into the activities of intermediaries, financial institutions and charities, such as Age Concern, in this saga?

Mr. Maude: The activities of intermediaries is obviously an important matter in the investigation and it is certainly an area which has been carefully examined. My hon. Friend will be aware that FIMBRA has already taken steps in respect of two intermediaries which applied for membership of it.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does not the principle of compensation in the case of Barlow Clowes have implications for the wider over-the-counter market? Will the Minister reject the comments of Mr. Wilmot, of Harvard Securities, who talked about the loss of one third of an investment portfolio as being acceptable? Is it not clear that the over-the-counter market is just a gigantic con? Will he close it down before many thousands of small investors lose more money that way?

Mr. Maude: It is only fair to say that a good many small companies manage to raise money and create jobs by the over-the-counter market, but it is nevertheless well understood to be a risky form of investment. Those who sell securities on the over-the-counter market make that clear.

Mr. McLoughlin: Has my hon. Friend seen the leader in The Times today, and is he aware that it says that his Department's inspectors are good at producing colourful, well-researched reports after the event, but are poor at prevention? What steps will he take to improve his Department's performance on that?

Mr. Maude: One development is that we now have a completely new regime of investor protection, which is being undertaken by organisations outside my Department. Lessons from the developments which have taken place recently will be an important aspect of our considerations. We shall need to look at what happened and what the outcome of the investigations is, and decide what steps we need to take.

Mr. Beith: How many people invested their redundancy money through this organisation and saw their only prospect of a cushion in retirement being lost, relying when they did so on the existence of the DTI's inspection system? Will the Minister take that into account when considering the issue of compensation?

Mr. Maude: I am certainly well aware and, I suspect, better aware that most hon. Members, of exactly how many people invested all their spare money in this company and of the anxiety and distress that has been caused. It is important to make a distinction between the two companies involved: Barlow Clowes Gilt Managers, which was United Kingdom-based and subject to United Kingdom regulation, and Barlow Clowes International, which was Gibraltar-based and not subject to United Kingdom regulation.

Sir Peter Emery: Will my hon. Friend make it absolutely clear to the House that whatever the Parliamentary Commissioner may or may not have said, he would want to ensure that the report of Sir Godfray le Quesne is with him in September or October, so that this matter can be brought to some sort of finalisation as soon as humanly possible?

Mr. Maude: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that it is important that these matters move fast, and they are moving fast. The Parliamentary Commissioner may well prefer to wait for Sir Godfray's report before undertaking his investigation, but that matter is entirely for him. He is not in any way inhibited from undertaking his own investigation before then.

Mr. Gould: Is not the Barrow Clowes case yet another instance of the unacceptable face of capitalism? What comfort can the Minister offer the thousands of people, many of whom are retired, with life savings at stake, who relied on his Department's supervision and who suffered calamitous loss as a result? Does he accept that what they require of him is not that he should take refuge in the delaying tactic of a departmental investigation, but an acknowledgement of his Department's responsibility in this matter and its willingness to compensate them for the loss of their life savings, which they have suffered by virtue of his Department's default?

Mr. Maude: It is pretty disgraceful that the hon. Gentleman seeks to exploit the genuine distress that many people have suffered in this way. It is frankly outrageous that he should suggest that my Department is in any way seeking to delay matters. We have been extremely frank. We have set up an independent inquiry headed by someone of great distinction and independence, and for the hon. Gentleman to say that we should give our response to that inquiry at this stage is manifestly absurd. We must wait to see what it says—wait for an authoritative version of what happened—and we shall decide what to do then.

Single Market

18. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what initiatives his Department is taking to help small firms understand and take advantage of the legal consequences of the 1992 single European market; and what information he has on the 1992 advertising campaign initiatives in the rest of Europe.

Mr. Maude: Our "Europe Open for Business" campaign aims to encourage firms throughout the country, large and small, to prepare for completion of the single market. About 45 per cent. of all business inquiries we have received on the single market have come from firms with fewer than 20 employees. I understand that only France and Ireland have so far launched major Government awareness campaigns, although I understand that several other countries are planning them.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful for that encouraging reply. Is my hon. Friend aware that one of the reasons why unemployment in west Norfolk has almost halved in the past four years has been the effort and contribution made by the small firms sector? Is he also aware that small firms in west Norfolk will not sit back and let 1992 happen? They are already getting geared up to make the most of it. What extra help, assistance and advertising will be given by the small firms service? What effort will it make to help small firms get geared up for 1992?

Mr. Maude: As my hon. Friend said, small firms are already gearing themselves up very well. We shall continue to provide such help as is appropriate for them. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the fact that small firms, as much as big ones, have a great deal to gain from exploiting the opportunities that the single market will bring, and they must look to their laurels to ensure that they remain, and become more competitive, to meet the challenge that will come from the continent.

Rover Group

3.31 pm

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the Rover Group.

I told the House when I announced the agreement we had reached with British Aerospace for the sale of the Government's shareholding in Rover Group that I would try to return to the House before the summer recess to report further developments.

This morning the European Commission decided the outline terms upon which it would be willing to close its state aid procedure. These terms effectively reduce the amount of the cash injection from the Government into Rover Group to £547 million with the consideration remaining at £150 million, but there would have been important relaxations in the tax conditions. Until lunchtime today, it appeared that British Aerospace was prepared to accept these terms. However, at the last minute it has asked for more time to consider the implications of other conditions attached to the Commission decision. Discussions between British Aerospace and the Government are continuing, and I will report to the House further as soon as I am able.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): Is not this brief and astonishing statement an embarrassing confession that the Government have got themselves into an unholy mess—a mess that remains unresolved even at the cost of a humiliating rebuff to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State and of conceding to the EEC control over everything, including the Government's pet privatisation projects, that might still be called British industrial policy?

Does not this mess leave the Government having to answer one or two difficult questions? If British Aerospace were to decide, as now seems in doubt, to go ahead with the reconstructed deal, how is it that the Secretary of State offered it £250 million more than it was prepared to accept? Why was the EEC so much more effective as a negotiator on behalf of the British taxpayer than the Secretary of State? Why was he so profligate with taxpayers' money? Is not this further evidence of how careless the Government are when they dispose of public assets without thought for the taxpayers' interest?

If, on the other hand, British Aerospace shareholders refuse to back the deal, what do the Government have to put in its place? After the Government have put all their eggs in this one basket, where is the fallback position for which we have pressed the Chancellor repeatedly in recent months? Where is the guarantee of the future of the last British volume car manufacturer? Do not Rover's excellent results today show what has been and can be achieved under public ownership, and do they not demonstrate that this ill-starred foray into privatisation is an expensive and shortsighted folly?

If the key to the deal is the tax arrangement whereby British Aerospace hopes to use Rover's tax losses to offset its own tax liability, will this not fall foul of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988? Is it perhaps this potential illegality that is now worrying British Aerospace?

Above all, where is the sense of commitment to the British volume car manufacturing industry that this sorry episode shows is so signally lacking both from the Government and now, sadly, from British Aerospace? Where is the recognition of the importance of this industry and the guarantee of its future? What reliance can be placed on an arrangement born only of the Government's obsession with privatisation and which even then the Government have bungled?

Mr. Clarke: My statement may have been surprisingly short, but it is not in the least embarrassing for me, my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State or the Government.

When I last appeared before the House, it was clear that the agreement that we had reached was conditional upon the discussions with the European Commission. My right hon. and noble Friend conducted with considerable skill the negotiations with the European Commission and with British Aerospace. He produced an agreement satisfactory to the Government, to the Commission and, as far as I was aware until an hour or two ago, to British Aerospace. At the last moment, British Aerospace has decided that it wishes to reconsider part of the deal. It is my opinion that the point troubling it is not especially important or material, but that is for British Aerospace, not me, to determine. When we have the result of its deliberations, I shall straight away make a further statement to the House.

The hon. Gentleman's other questions are based, not surprisingly—inevitably in the circumstances—on his ignorance of the precise deal arrived at, but that does not stop him, as usual, speculating or trying to make points out of it. The scale and structure of the original agreement has been changed to reflect the negotiations with the Commission, the compliance with the state aid procedures that the Government support actively inside the EEC, and the considerable improvement in the trading position of the Rover Group since we first entered into our agreement. In my opinion, an agreement can now be reached that is satisfactory to the Government, and I can speak on behalf of the Government.

The hon. Gentleman guessed that the key to the deal might be the illegality of the tax arrangements, but he is wrong. He has made a false guess. The proposals for the tax arrangement are entirely consistent with the law of the land and are not being queried by anybody who understands what he is talking about—which is not the case with Opposition Members, who are speculating. The time to give the details to the House is when we are satisfied that the negotiations are concluded. That is now in the hands of British Aerospace, which I trust will soon come to a decision. I undertake to inform the House fully as soon as I can.

Mr. Norman Tebbitt (Chingford): Is it not entirely consistent with the Opposition's usual attitude that the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) should damn the deal whether or not it goes ahead? He approves neither of successfully floating it into privatisation nor of keeping it nationalised. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, although great progress has been made by the Rover Group, and despite what the hon. Gentleman called splendid results, it is taking £400 million or £500 million in cash to persuade anyone to take the business away?

In his further talks with Commissioner Sutherland, will my right hon. and learned Friend express the hope that if this is the sauce which is applied to the British goose there had better be the same sauce for the German gander when the proposed merger between MBB and Daimler Benz comes forward, with a proposed subsidy of about £1 billion?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with the first part of my right hon. Friend's question. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) condemned the conditional agreement we reached; although he could not make up his mind whether we were making too big or too small a cash injection into the company, he was against it. He has condemned today's agreement without knowing what it is. He will continue to condemn whatever emerges. To be fair, I think he prefers a nationalised Rover Group. That is the regime under which the company cost the British taxpayer £2·9 billion since British Leyland was nationalised in 1976.

We must sort out the matter. I have to make it clear that our problem is not with Commissioner Sutherland. We have entered into a satisfactory agreement with the commissioner, consistent with the state aid proposals which this country supports. We do not think there should be competition in subsidies throughout western Europe. The British Labour party thinks that, but we and the Commission do not. I agree with my right hon. Friend that we will expect the Commission to take seriously talk in the press of massive German injections of state aid into companies like MBB.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): Is the Chancellor of the Duchy aware that not only are all the changes confusing but they put in doubt the nature of the deal which might be expected? Is he aware that the Public Accounts Committee will certainly want to scrutinise carefully the various changes to make sure that he is getting the best possible deal on behalf of the taxpayer and is ensuring that we get value for money at the end of the day?

Mr. Clarke: The right hon. Gentleman is a careful man, so he rightly expresses doubt at a time when, for obvious reasons, he cannot know the full details of the agreement. I hear what he says about the Public Accounts Committee rightly wishing to take an interest once the matter has been concluded. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that the Government have been careful to make sure that the interests of taxpayers, the company and the economy are taken care of in the discussions.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Regardless of what the shareholders of British Aerospace may think about this —surely they are entitled to reconsider the matter when there has been such a significant change in the terms—is it not the case that the deal offers much the best future for the Rover Group? When the company was to be offered for sale to foreign owners, the Opposition did not like it, and when it was to be British ownership they did not like that either because they have not go a constructive thought in their heads about it.

Mr. Clarke: Of course, the shareholders in British Aerospace have not yet entered directly into the matter. Anything that emerges from the discussions now taking place will have to go to an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders if the British Aerospace board continues to be in agreement with the deal. Certainly I have made it clear throughout, as has my right hon. and noble Friend, that we see considerable attractions in a satisfactory agreement of this kind. We think that the uniting of British Aerospace with the Rover Group would be welcomed by those who work in the company and by all who supply and deal with the product as well.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): Is not the Minister aware that we have now got the worst of all worlds? Unless the uncertainty created by the Government's policy is resolved quickly, it will be unnecessarily difficult for the Rover Group to sell cars during August, one of the most important selling months in the year.

Mr. Clarke: I agree that it would be worrying if uncertainty surrounded the Rover Group for any longer than was necessary. I share the hon. Gentleman's concern that that should not be so. I trust that any difficulties are resolved rapidly and that I can report to the House in the very near future. I expected to be able to make a statement to the House this afternoon expressing in full the terms of the agreement. I thought that British Aerospace was in agreement with that, but as it has asked for more time neither I nor my right hon. and noble Friend had any alternative but to agree.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Can the Minister say something about the great distress and uncertainty caused to the splendid Rover Group whose cars I have always bought and found satisfactory? Is he really saying that the Government are reducing the aid to be given to Rover because Commissioner Sutherland has asked it but that they will make it up by what he calls tax concessions? Is that a sensible state of mind?

Does my right hon. and learned Friend appreciate the views of British Aerospace, which, like many British companies, feels rather aggrieved that we always reveal full details of financial transactions, yet, in the case of Airbus, where British Aerospace is carrying a horrendous loss, the other three participants never reveal any details about the money given by their Governments? Is it not time to ask the Commission to ask other countries to act as cleanly in financial terms as Britain does?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with most of what my hon. Friend has said, except that, in the case of the Airbus project, not one of the four partners reveals full information to any of the other three, nor does the Commission take any part in the matter.

In principle, I agree with my hon. Friend that we should establish in Europe a regime whereby state aids are fully exposed to the Commission and other members, needless competition between countries is avoided and the matter is policed by the Commission in accordance with the Community's agreed policy. Last year the Commission changed our deal on Leyland-DAF. It changed the French Government's recent Renault proposals and we shall expect it to take a close interest in the Italian Government's proposals for the restructuring of its steel industry in southern Italy and in the German proposals for the aircraft industry and the Daimler Benz-MBB deal.

There is, therefore, no disagreement between my hon. Friend and me. We discussed the deal, which was satisfactory, with the Commission and we shall wait to see whether British Aerospace confirms the impression with which it left us this morning, that it found the deal satisfactory.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): Is not the Minister looking as red today as would do credit to the Labour Front Bench, not only as a result of the fiasco in which he has involved the House this afternoon, but also because the golden give-away terms of the deal have been exposed by the Commission and it has been shown that British Aerospace is not interested without a golden give-away? Will the Minister at least be honest enough to tell the House what the sticking point is with British Aerospace and what he will do about it if the deal falls through?

Mr. Clarke: My florid complexion is a natural result of my healthy lifestyle. I agree that it contrasts somewhat with the pallor of the hon. Gentleman, who does not appear to get into the open air very much in the south-west of England.

The agreement reached is based on changes to the structure and scale of the original agreement, which was always conditional upon Commission consent. However, I hope that the House will agree that it is obviously not sensible for me to relate the exact nature of the agreement until the final snag with British Aerospace—if it proves to be a snag—has been resolved. It would be wrong for me to start trailing in discussion the points at issue, particularly as I am still somewhat puzzled to discover that British Aerospace believes the matter to be so significant.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that, basically, the most important thing is that Austin Rover should remain a British national based on another excellent British company, British Aerospace? Does he further agree that, although British Aerospace may be a little coy at this time, it may work out that, with the tax concessions and the excellent future of Austin Rover, which has turned a £39 million loss into a £7 million profit, this is a great venture for it?

Does my right hon. and learned Friend further agree that, although the Opposition are suggesting that the deal should be allowed to fall through, British Aerospace is willing to commit £1,000 million to the future of the great technological advance of this country, which is what we need, should have and, I believe, can have?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is a significant voice in such matters in the west midlands and in the House and I hope that those people concerned with the last-minute consideration of the agreement will bear in mind his opinions.

British Aerospace is one of the key manufacturing companies in this country. It produces extremely advanced, high-technology aircraft. The Rover Group has announced extremely encouraging results today and is doing very well, thanks to Graham Day and the management and work force of the company. I note my hon. Friend's opinion that a purchase by British Aerospace would be to the advantage of all concerned.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): Are we not having today a demonstration of breathtaking incompetence on the Government's part in this matter? Will the Minister tell us what the snag, as he described it, is—or does he not know? He confessed to being puzzled. Does that not show the irresponsibility with which the Government are handling the matter? Will not the uncertainty generated by the statement damage the interests of car workers in this country and all those who depend on their work? Have not the Government made a mess of this? What will the Minister do if the deal falls through and British Aerospace will not go along with Rover?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman cannot reasonably cast doubts on the Government's position. I know exactly what the agreement is. My right hon. and noble Friend negotiated a satisfactory conditional agreement a few months ago, on which I reported to the House, and he has negotiated a satisfactory agreement with the Commission and BAe. It is BAe's management which decided at the last moment that it wanted a little more time to think about one detail. I know what that detail is. It is not for me but for BAe to reach a decision on that. I am merely saying that I am surprised that the management attaches so much weight to it. However, I trust that that problem will soon be resolved.

I have already explained that it plainly is not sensible for me to start conducting the next stage in the negotiations in this forum; it would not help the Rover Group or anybody else. I hope that I shall soon be able to bring fuller and more satisfactory news to the hon. Gentleman who has a perfectly valid and legitimate constituency interest.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that in view of today's events he is now open to receive alternative bids for the Rover Group, whether from Britain or abroad; and if not now, when?

Mr. Clarke: I have been avoiding hypothetical questions. My hon. Friend is jumping the gun more than somewhat. As I received the news that BAe wanted more time in a message from its chairman only two and a half hours ago, it may be that in two and a half hours' time all will be resolved. It remains the Government's clear commitment to return the Rover Group to the private sector, and the continuing good performance of that company under the leadership of Graham Day with the support of the work force is taking us encouragingly in that direction by whatever route.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): As a determined opponent of Rover privatisation and the Common Market, may I at least welcome the Minister's statement on the delay on the basis of any port in a storm? If he wants to stop speculation in the disagreements—not the agreement—that have emerged in the past two and a half hours, after Sir Raymond Lygo said that the basis of BAe's wanting Rover was on the basis of no cost to the company, apart from the risk, will he confirm what happened this morning at the commissioner's meeting in terms of amendments and conditions that has caused BAe to back off? If Commissioner Sutherland can negotiate a £253 million reduction in BAe's bribe, why could not the Minister?

Mr. Clarke: There was a full meeting of the Commission this morning, at which it approved the terms negotiated by Commissioner Sutherland, just as the Government have supported and approved the terms negotiated by my right hon. and noble Friend. I shall let BAe know that the hon. Gentleman approves of its last-minute request for more time; it might encourage it to make up its mind and to look at the deal with more interest again. As is invariably the case as a result of discussions with the Commission because of its duty under the state aids regime, there have been changes in the scale and nature of the deal, as there were last year in the case of Leyland-DAF and recently in the case of Renault. What has emerged is, I believe, satisfactory to all the parties, but it is not for me but for the BAe board to decide whether it is prepared to go ahead and recommend it to its shareholders.

Sir Giles Shaw (Pudsey): My right hon. and learned Friend is still to be congratulated on the zeal with which he is pursuing the deal, and I am glad to hear him say that he is satisfied with what Commissioner Sutherland has to say on this issue, but, in view of the problem that has occurred, what time limit has he placed on BAe to make its decision clear, since it is surely BAe which has failed to respond to what was a good offer originally?

Mr. Clarke: We are not in a position to impose a time scale. BAe is entitled to ask for more time to consider the matter and it will appreciate the need to come to a final decision as rapidly as possible. I cannot give my hon. Friend any more information than I have, since I discovered only at half-past one that BAe wished to delay a final decision and at half-past two I was on my feet here answering questions. Perhaps by the time I return to the office all will be resolved so that I can come back to the House as soon as possible to give the final details.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have a very long day ahead of us. I will allow questions to continue for a further five minutes. As the Chancellor of the Duchy has just said, this is an interim statement.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Is the Chancellor of the Duchy aware that any questions from me will be extremely gentle and cautious as I spent 25 years involved in the motor industry and I am aware how the industry may change its mind at the last moment? He has my personal sympathy for these difficulties. Having said that, will he say something in the new statement about Bathgate, where the Rover Group still owns what was the biggest concentration of machine tools under a single roof in Europe? That may not be a central problem, but it is very important for my constituents.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman has reminded me yet again of his concern about the Bathgate site. I believe that that is a planning matter to be resolved by the local authority and by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. However, I will bring myself up to date with events. I share the hon. Gentleman's desire to see the site brought back into productive use and providing employment for his constituents once again. I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland shares that desire.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): Is it not clear that those who work for the Rover Group will be much better off under British Aerospace than they would be if the Rover Group continued to go cap in hand to the Government for more funds? After the expenditure of £2·9 billion, is it not a matter for congratulation and in the public interest that the House has the prospect of staunching this endless flow of money?

Mr. Clarke: I agree that, apart from this unexpected last-minute hitch, our present position is so much more satisfactory than anyone could have thought possible had the Rover Group continued to be in public hands. The Rover Group's performance is steadily improving and plainly we have reached the stage where it should be returned to the private sector where I am sure that it would be much better off than it used to be as a pensioner client of the Government.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Is the Department of Trade and Industry so inefficient that it takes an EEC commissioner to point out the bare-faced robbery of the British taxpayer through this proposed deal by British Aerospace? Does not the Chancellor of the Duchy realise that in his zealotry and bigotry to sell off a publicly owned company he is causing uncertainty in the private sector? Major component suppliers such as Hepworth and Grandage in Bradford which supply the majority of the pistons to the Rover Group inevitably must face a degree of uncertainty, like the rest of the industry, including the Rover Group, as a result of this shilly-shallying. Why cannot the Chancellor make a commitment to retain public ownership so that every company in the components supply industry knows precisely where it is?

Mr. Clarke: I will not explain again the basis on which everyone who has any experience of the state aids case knows that the deal was bound to emerge in the course of discussions with the European Commission. The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) sounded as if he was endorsing the final decision that we reached with Commissioner Sutherland. That is very welcome, and I look forward to the hon. Gentleman's support when he finds out what he is talking about and when he sees the scale and structure of what we have negotiated.

We are satisfied, the Commission is satisfied, and I believe that the taxpayer should also be satisfied. The component suppliers to whom the hon. Gentleman has referred have always been strongly in favour of the sale of British Aerospace. As I explained in an earlier statement, I think that it is in their interest that an agreement of this kind should be entered into.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept that in my constituency the Rover Group plant at Longbridge, the Lode lane Land Rover plant, the Cowley plant and others have worked outstandingly well to produce the good results for the Rover Group, as we have seen? Is he aware how much each and every one of the employees looks forward to working for an excellent company like British Aerospace? On behalf of all the employees, will he convey to the British Aerospace board the message that faint heart never won fair lady?

Mr. Clarke: I join my hon. Friend in congratulating the work force on the welcome improvement and results. The half-yearly results show a profit before interest of £28·8 million, compared with a loss of £10 million for the same period last year. That improvement in the group's performance had its bearing on the negotiations about the agreement as it ceased to be conditional and we talked about a final agreement which we believed should be accepted to achieve the result that my hon. Friend desires.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): Would it not be a good idea if the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster were to nip off to his office to find out the up-to-date situation? He might then put us all out of our misery. We shall keep the debate going while he is away.

Mr. Clarke: I agree entirely with that suggestion. I am dying to get back to my office to find out what is happening.

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that this is a bad day for the Opposition? Does he agree also that, on a day when the Rover Group announced good results and when the partnership between two great British companies is still continuing, it is quite devastating to find Opposition Members laughing and negative and that they do not regard the matter as important? My final question is on behalf of the components industry and dealers. Will my right hon. and learned Friend ask Opposition Members whether they would prefer a deal with a foreign cartel?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend. Opposition Members came to the House prepared to denounce the agreement, whatever it was, and they are still trying to denounce it, but they cannot find out what it was or what it might be. They do not know what they want, so I shall not put the final propositions to them. I do not believe that there is any undue cause for concern among dealers and others in the industry. I hope to be able to report back to the House as soon as I can.

Dunstaffnage Marine Research Laboratory

4.1 pm

Mrs. Ray Michie (Argyll and Bute): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the loss of 20 jobs at the Dunstaffnage marine research laboratory, near Oban, in my constituency.

The announcement, made at 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon, deals a double blow. At a time of concern for the sea and the management of the resources that it contains, the announcement underlines the need to do more rather than less marine research. Because of the huge development of the fish farming industry in the Highlands and Islands and in my constituency of Argyll and Bute in particular, research should have a high priority.

The laboratory is funded by the Natural Environment Research Council, and the issue is not just one of straightforward, all-round reduction in NERC activities. The lastest cuts hit marine science more than anything else, and they are illogical and misconceived. The laboratory is one of the largest employers in the area, employing 70 people. Staff redundancies of that magnitude will undoubtedly affect the non-tourist element of the local economy and have damaging and grave consequences for a small town such as Oban. I urge that the issue be debated.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Lady asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that she believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the newly announced job losses at Dunstaffnage marine research laboratory near Oban and their effects on the Government's research programme."

I have listened with great care and concern to what the hon. Lady has said on behalf of her constituents, but I regret that I do not consider the matter that she has raised as being appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20, and I cannot therefore submit her application to the House. I hope that she will find other ways of raising it.

Nurses' Pay Award

4.3 pm

Ms. Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing an urgent, specific and important matter with which you have dealt favourably in the past, Mr. Speaker, namely,

"the underfunding of the nurses' pay award."

The matter is important and should have priority over all other business in the House if we are to avert the crisis in our National Health Service, in its 40th year, which was almost on the cards earlier this year, and which was averted only as a result of your actions, Mr. Speaker.

It is urgent because it has just come to light in an article in The Guardian today that it looks as though the Government's promises to meet the nurses' pay award in full are not now to be met. I do not wish nurses' morale to be so low that our National Health Service crumbles as a result of the Government's broken promises.

It is important that the promised grading review should be done in an objective way. Those who are employed by the National Health Service can have no confidence in the Government if they consider that their pay is to be determined by a top ceiling and that their work will not be properly evaluated. In my constituency of Stoke-on-Trent, North and in the west midlands, I have seen nursing staff leaving the National Health Service. They are not leaving in great numbers because they are banking on the review. They have still not received the 4 per cent. in their pay packets. If we are to avert a further crisis, we should have a debate.

Health Service workers, and nurses in particular, need reassurance from the Government. We need a debate before the summer recess. The Secretary of State may well have said that he received a standing ovation when he last met the nurses, but if he is to be true to his policies full reassurances need to be given by the Government. They can be given only if we adjourn and fully debate the matter now.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Lady asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that she believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the Government's underfunding of the nurses' pay award."

I have listened with care to what the hon. Lady has said about the matter. As she knows, my sole duty in considering an application under Standing Order No. 20 is to decide whether it should be given precedence over the Orders set down for today or tomorrow and whether it meets the criteria laid down by the Standing Order. I regret that I cannot submit her application to the House.

Order Paper

4.6 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you confirm that, among your many responsibilities to the House, it is your responsibility to ensure that the items that appear each day on the Order Paper are in order, acceptable and relevant to the House, and that you do that through the excellent work of the Clerks and, through them, your instruction to the Table Office? Will you confirm also that this week you gave particular instructions to the Table Office and the Clerks to ensure that any hon. Member who might seek to put an item on the Order Paper would be present in the House, would present it and, if necessary, vote on it? Have you particularly drawn attention to the fact that, if he should seek to put anything on the Order Paper, the Leader of the Opposition is far away and indulging in business that is detrimental to this country and is quite unable to fulfil any obligations that he may have in respect of the Order Paper?

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Member for what he has said about my responsibility for the matter. The whole House will agree that anything that appears on the Order Paper is in order; otherwise it would not so appear.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the excellent services that the Clerks provide, will you ask them to place on the Order Paper or in Hansard a list of all orders and motions in the name of the Prime Minister that have been tabled when she has been out of the country?

Mr. Speaker: We should move on.

BILL PRESENTED

Compensation Advisory Board

Mr. Jack Ashley, supported by Dr. Michael Clark, Mr. Frank Cook, Mr. Frank Haynes, Mr. Simon Hughes, Mr. Alfred Morris and Mr. Roger Sims, presented a Bill to establish a Board to make recommendations for the levels of compensation awarded to injured persons; and for related purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 200.]

Education (Right to Nursery Places)

4.9 pm

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to place on local authorities the statutory duty to provide free nursery places for all children at local authority nurseries.

Education begins from birth. The true value of our society is the way in which we prepare for our future. Investing in our children and securing for them the best possible opportunities and facilities is the greatest investment that we can make. What I propose is neither radical nor new. In 1936, the Board of Education on nursery schools and classes described pre-school classes as "on the fringes of official organisation, more or less acknowledged, better or worse provided for as opinion varied in regard to them."

The Education Act 1944 placed a duty on local authorities to provide a discretionary power to provide nursery education. In 1967, the Plowden report strongly advocated nursery provision for all three-year-olds and four-year-olds. In 1972, a White Paper on education published by the Prime Minister in her previous incarnation stated that the Government's "aim is that within the next 10 years nursery education should become available without charge . . . to those children of three and four whose parents wish them to benefit from it."

Sixteen years later, the Goverment's position has changed but it is still hampered by the Treasury. The White Paper "Better Schools" stated:

"In view of the benefits of education for the under fives, and parental demand for provision, the Government will make it its aim that its plans for local authority expenditure should allow provision attributable to under fives to continue in real terms".

The Select Committee report on primary schools dealing with provision for the under-fives strongly set out the arguments for pre-school education.

Local authorities have a statutory duty to provide full-time education for children from the beginning of the term after they reach their fifth birthday. In 1983, only 23 per cent. of three and four-year-olds received any form of nursery education, and 700,000 of them received none. Today, a little more than 1 million of them are receiving some kind of education. The state provides only half in formal classes, for a total of 308,000 children. There are more than 3·5 million children uder the age of five. Ninety per cent. of parents with three or four-year-old children, and 40 per cent. of parents of children under three years of age, want some form of nursery places for them.

Over the past decade, the voluntary sector has flourished. It is right that I should pay tribute to two organisations that have led the fight. They are the Pre-School Playgroups Association, which links an estimated 600,000 families in 430 branches, and the National Children's Bureau, which launched an under-fives unit in 1986. Playgroups provide 34 per cent. of the places for under-fives, and it is estimated that 52 per cent. of all three and four-year-olds in England attend playgroups compared with 22 per cent. of the same group in nursery schools and classes and 23 per cent. in primary schools. Although playgroups account for more than half the number of pre-school places, local authority financial support is low in most areas and non-existent in others.

Government statistics reveal enormous differences between one part of the country and another. Some have reached impressive levels of three and four-year-olds in nursery schools—Hounslow, 69 per cent.; Newham 63 per cent.; and Wolverhampton, 56 per cent. Others ought to be ashamed of themselves, with the percentage of three and four-year-olds in nursery schools in Suffolk being 13 per cent.; Norfolk, 5 per cent.; and Bromley, 1 per cent.

The chances of a nursery place depend entirely on where one lives. In Leicestershire, where only 23 per cent. of three and four-year-olds are in nursery classes, there are huge differences within the county. Fifty-nine schools have provision for three-year-olds, 52 schools for four-year-olds, and 188 schools no provision at all. Lack of staff, capitation and accommodation are the reasons given. In my constituency, as in those of other hon. Members, I am sure, other groups and organisations provide certain facilities, ranging from playgroups in local churches—such as at St. Mary's, Humberston—to the Avalon youth project, and to the mothers' and toddlers' groups that meet in the neighbourhood centres of Netherhall, Northfields, Evington, Coleman and Thornby Lodge. I have visited all of them and they are all starved of resources.

In terms of child care, we are sliding behind the rest of Europe. Belgium and France provide free nursery education for children from the age of three, and Sweden is working towards an integrated system of child centres, community care and education under the same Ministry.

The role of women has changed dramatically, and that has added to the demand for nurseries. Women now make up 43 per cent. of the work force; 23 per cent. of all women with children under five work, and many more would like to do so.

In this area, there is a multiplicity of organisations with which to deal—playgroups, mothers' and toddlers' groups, child minders and nursery places. But separate management and planning systems for pre-school provision remain one of the greatest barriers to the development of a coherent policy. Only Strathclyde authority, whose record I commend to the House, has so far centralised the management of services for the under-fives in one department. A further 21 authorities have an under-fives sub-committee.

My Bill would establish a national policy framework for under-fives provision that will include a statement of objectives of provision and regulations for the co-ordination of statutory and voluntary sector provision. It will give three and four-year-olds an opportunity for pre-school education and care in whatever setting. It will establish the fact that statutory provision does not mean just nursery schools and classes but includes playgroups, mothers' and toddlers' groups, and possibly child minders.

My Bill will also ensure that local authorities will have an obligation to consult with and be empowered to fund the voluntary sector. Parents will be consulted, so that resources will be based in the community, within pram-pushing distance.

There should be a national, interdepartmental body concerned with the under-fives. The dispute between education and social services must cease. At a local level, local authorities will be made to establish new under-fives sub-committees and submit plans for the provision of pre-school services. Finally, my Bill will give workers access to training and opportunities.

All recent surveys show that some form of pre-school education gives children an enormous intellectual boost. This Bill is a toddlers' charter. With a rattle in one hand and with a book in the other, our children can be endowed with the incalculable gift of knowledge. If we fail to respond, in later years our children will be able rightly to accuse us betraying their trust and squandering their future. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Keith Vaz, Mr. Thomas McAvoy, Mrs. Maria Fyfe, Mr. Ian McCartney, Mr. Alan Williams, Mr. Dennis Turner, Mr. Jimmy Hood, Mr. Jimmy Wray, Mrs. Alice Mahon, Mr. John Battle, Mr. David Hinchliffe, Mr. Derek Fatchett and Miss Ann Clywd.

EDUCATION (RIGHT TO NURSERY PLACES)

Mr. Keith Vaz accordingly presented a Bill to place on local authorities the statutory duty to provide free nursery places for all children at local authority nurseries: And the same was read a First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Wednesday 27 July, and to be printed. [Bill 198.]

WAYS AND MEANS

Conversion of Building Societies into Public Limited Companies

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That provision may be made in connection with transfers in accordance with section 97 and the other applicable provisions (within the meaning of that section) of the Building Societies Act 1986.—[Mr. Peter Lilley.]

4.17 pm

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I shall not detain the House for more than a moment, but it is worth placing on record at this stage, as we did during the Committee proceedings, the fact that the Opposition are deeply unhappy at the prospect of mutual building societies converting to plcs. We believe that much that is good about the building society movement will be lost if that occurs. However, this resolution relates specifically to the possibility that later in today's proceedings we shall have an opportunity to debate Government amendment No. 75, which enshrines a principle for which we argued in Committee. We are grateful to the Government for taking that issue on board. It would be churlish of us to do anything other than wish godspeed to this resolution.

Question put and agreed to.

Orders of the Day

Finance (No. 2) Bill

Not amended (in the Committee), and as amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

4.18 pm

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will it be possible for you to reconsider the provisional selection and to include new clause 20? There are very special circumstances. If there were not, I would not mention it. First, if we do not discuss new clause 20, the House will have no opportunity of discussing in detail the application of VAT to hearing aids and spectacles, which is a very important issue. It also means that the House will not be able to discuss another issue that is constitutionally important—the decision of a foreign court in instructing the Government what tax to levy. Bearing in mind that a decision was made after the Bill's Second Reading, and that the House had no opportunity to consider those matters in detail, there is a case for having a straight debate on new clause 20.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister has agreed to do something about vouchers for spectacles and the increase that will be necessary because of VAT being charged on them. Could he make a statement now, or get one of this colleagues from the Department of Health and Social Security to do so? Perhaps he could make such a statement if you selected the clause for debate.

Mr. Speaker: I examined the new clauses and amendments very carefully this morning, and I do not think that I can reconsider my selection at this stage. The hon. Gentleman will know, however, that clause 13 has been included in the Bill, and it would be perfectly in order to debate the matter on Third Reading.

Ordered,

That the Finance (No. 2) Bill, as amended, be considered in the following order, namely, new Clauses, amendments relating to Clause 1, Schedule 1, Clauses 2 to 4, Schedule 2, Clauses 5 to 35, Schedule 3, Clauses 36 to 50, Schedule 4, Clauses 51 to 57, Schedule 5, Clauses 58 to 64, Schedule 6, Clauses 65 to 94, Schedule 7 Clauses 95 to 106, Schedule 8, Clauses 107 to 111, Schedule 9, Clauses 112 to 142, Schedule 10, Clause 143, Schedule 11, Clauses 144 to 146, new Schedules, amendments relating to Schedule 12.—[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle.]

New Clause 18

UNIT TRUSTS: RELIEF ON CERTAIN PAYMENTS

'. Section 469 of the Taxes Act 1988 (taxation of unauthorised and certain other unit trusts) shall have effect, and shall be deemed always to have had effect, with the insertion of the following subsections after subsection (5)—

"(5A) Subsections (5B) below applies where for any year of assessment—

(a) the trustees are (or, apart from this subsection, would be) chargeable under section 350 with tax on payments treated as made by them under subsection (3) above, and

(b) there is an uncredited surplus in the case of the scheme.

(5B) Where this subsection applies, the amount on which the trustees would otherwise be so chargeable shall be reduced—

(a) if the surplus is greater than that amount, to nil, or

(b) if it is not, by an amount equal to the surplus.

(5C) For the purposes of subsections (5A) and (5B) above whether there is an uncredited surplus for a year of assessment in the case of a scheme (and, if so, its amount) shall be ascertained by—

(a) determining, for each earlier year of assessment in which the income on which the trustees were chargeable to tax by virtue of subsection (2) above exceeded the amount treated by subsection (3) above as annual payments received by the unit holders, the amount of the excess,

(b) aggregating the amounts determined in the case of the scheme under paragraph (a) above, and

(c) deducting from that aggregate the total of any reductions made in the case of the scheme under subsection (5B) above for earlier years of assessment.

(5D) The references in subsection (5C)(a) above to subsections (2) and (3) above include references to subsections (2) and (3) of section 354A of the 1970 Act.".'.—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Norman Lamont): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause addresses a technical problem affecting the rules for taxing the income of unauthorised unit trusts. We discussed the matter briefly in Committee. The present rules can produce an excessive tax charge on a trust. That occurs when the trust income for a tax year is less than the income that it distributes to its unit holders. The extra tax charge will reduce the amount that the trustees can distribute and will therefore disadvantage unit holders, including charities and pension funds.

The point was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot), who tabled a new clause that we were unable to accept. I said that we would table our own new clause.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): If we were living in the mid-17th century—and given the way our proceedings have gone in the past week one could be forgiven for being under such a misapprehension—the new clause would be known as the Concession of Arbuthnot, in honour of the hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot). That has a nice mid-17th century ring to it. The one late-20th century point of which the Financial Secretary should have informed the House is how much it will cost, and I wonder whether he would do so now.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The cost will be minimal.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 19

VALUATION OF INTERESTS IN LAND

'.—(1) In section 294 of the Taxes Act 1988 (companies with interests in land), after subsection (5) there shall be inserted—

"(5A) For the purposes of this section, the value of an interest in any building or other land shall be adjusted by deducting the market value of any machinery or plant which is so installed or otherwise fixed in or to the building or other land as to become, in law, part of it."

(2) This section shall have effect in relation to valuations which fall to be made after the passing of this Act.'—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

In Committee the Opposition tabled an amendment which would have prevented the land and buildings description on the business expansion scheme from applying to manufacturing companies. At the time, I said that I did not want to favour a particular industry in the way that they suggested, but that I recognised the problem posed to companies with valuable fixed plant. As a result we have devised the new clause.

Where plant and machinery form part of a company's land or buildings, they are taken into account when the land and buildings are valued. The new clause will deduct the value of plant and machinery from that of land and buildings. The change will be of particular help to companies with valuable specialised plant and machinery. It is not confined to any particular sector, but will apply to all companies that qualify under the BES rules.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): In Committee we highlighted many of the problems that we saw in the operation of the business expansion scheme. One of those problems was the low percentage of BES companies within the manufacturing sector. That percentage is going down rather than up, and we fear that it will go down even further with the institution of the new rented accommodation scheme introduced by the Budget and the Finance Bill.

We argued strongly that some extra incentive should be given to assist manufacturing industry trying to raise investment through BES. The Government accepted the principle, but we are disappointed that they have not taken the route that we suggested, which was to single out enterprises within industrial use classes 2, 3 and 4. However, they have recognised the need to give some consideration to companies in this position.

We will give two cheers for the new clause. It is a concession of sorts to the points that we put in Committee, and although we do not feel that it goes far enough or takes the right approach, it is none the less welcome.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 23

DEFERRED CHARGES ON GAINS BEFORE 31ST MARCH 1982

'.Schedule (Deferred charges on gains before 31st March 1982) to this Act (which provides for the reduction of a deferred charge to tax where the charge is wholly or partly attributable to an increase in the value of an asset before 31st March 1982) shall have effect.'.—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Brought up, and read the First Time.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second Time.

Mr. Speaker: With this we may take Government amendment No. 73.

Mr. Lamont: In Committee a number of my hon. Friends expressed concern that the rebasing provisions would not apply where tax on gains had been deferred between 1982 and 1988. My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General undertook to review the position and see whether something could be done to meet those cases. We have also received a number of representations on the matter.

This is an issue on which the arguments of principle cut both ways. On the one hand, the full benefit of rebasing is available where the deferral took place on or before 31 March 1982. So to give no benefit from rebasing where the deferral was between 1982 and 1988 might appear a little harsh. On the other hand, we must recognise the opposite argument, which is the comparison with those who in the same circumstances opted not to defer tax and will have already paid it in full without the benefit of rebasing. None the less, we have concluded after careful consideration that on balance there is a case for providing some relief in the circumstances that I have outlined.

A huge range of provisions provide for tax deferral in one form or another. The circumstances in which the reliefs can apply, and the potential permutations where more than one relief is involved, are numerous. Some cases —for example, where gains on business assets have been rolled over within a group of companies—will be extremely complex. In other cases, records will frequently not be available of assets on which tax has been deferred. That is because for purely practical reasons it is often unnecessary to retain such information. An example is where a gain on the disposal of a business asset has been rolled over against the cost of a replacement asset. Once the gain to be rolled over—and hence the reduced cost of the replacement asset—have been established, there is no need in practice to retain records relating to the history of the old asset. Even the Inland Revenue does not keep records for ever.

The matter presents the Government with something of a dilemma. Where a deferral has taken place since 1985, a March 1982 valuation will probably have been made for indexation purposes. Other things being equal, it would be possible to confine the tax charge to the post-1982 component of the gain, although even here only if the records of what underlies the deferred gain have been kept.

On the other hand, if the deferral took place after 1982 but before 1985, there will not have been a March 1982 valuation. In the case of a gift made during that period, there is no reason why the donee should know when the donor acquired the asset, and the donor's records might well no longer exist. Accordingly, there would be difficulties in extending rebasing to even the most straightforward case.

At the other extreme, there will frequently be more complicated cases—perhaps where there is a chain of deferrals, one asset being rolled over into another under the same or more than one provision. A business asset may have been sold in, say, 1984, the gain rolled over against a number of replacement assets with rollover relief being claimed. Some of those assets may since have been sold with tax paid at the time. Others may have been replaced, and yet others may still be held by the taxpayer. Even where full records of all the transactions are available, it would be a formidable task to identify the pre-1982 component of the gain which had not already been brought into the charge. Some of the amendments moved by my hon. Friends during the debate in the Committee of the whole House recognised that difficulty and sought to provide relief, not by extending the 1982 rebasing, but in a different way.

We have considered the matter and although it would be possible to devise rules to give the full benefit of rebasing in the more complicated cases where records are still available, those rules would be highly complex and would impose considerable costs on the Revenue, the taxpayers and their advisers. Such rules would be wholly impracticable if complete records had not been retained. Accordingly, rebasing would not be possible in the more complicated cases.

4.30 pm

Effectively, the choice was between giving the benefit of rebasing in cases where the computations can be done with an arbitrary solution for the remainder, or an arbitrary approach across the board. However, having different rules for different groups of taxpayers would involve making unfair distinctions and would lead to anomalies. In principle, all taxpayers should be treated equally and on the same basis. As I have said, even where the precise calculations could be made, the costs of doing so would be high. For that reason, we concluded that the only solution which is both practicable and equitable is that there should be an arbitrary amount of relief in all cases. That is the approach that we have adopted in the new clause and schedule.

Broadly speaking, the provisions take the deferred gain that is now in charge and halve it where it can be established that part of the deferred gain results either directly or indirectly from the disposal of an asset that was acquired before 31 March 1982. In some cases—for example, where the first asset was acquired just before 1982—the relief is undoubtedly generous. In other cases —for example where the first asset was acquired many years ago—it is less generous. Therefore, I accept that the solution that we have adopted involves a degree of rough justice. However, for the reasons that I have outlined, the only alternative was to provide no relief in those circumstances, and we received many representations on that point.

The most common provision under which tax can be deferred are the gifts and replacement of business asset reliefs. But other less common provisions also provide for tax deferral, such as equities being converted into corporate bonds. The relief that I have described will extend to those provisions as well and will be available where there has been a chain of deferrals. Like capital gains reform generally, the relief will apply to disposals on or after 6 April 1988 and will be subject to a claim. That is because the Inland Revenue will frequently be unable to identify the cases where it is due. The relief will probably cost under £50 million in a full year.

I recognise that the solution is a somewhat rough and ready one to the problems that have been identified. However, it does have some merit. Although there are arguments both ways, on balance the solution that we have adopted should be widely welcomed by those who have been affected.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The Financial Secretary has treated the House to a candid review of the two options that the Government considered in some detail when looking at the requests that have been made to them for reform in this area. However, although he referred to it, he did not spend much time discussing the third option, which was to do nothing and to leave the situation as it would have been without the new clause and accompanying schedule. That option was worthy of consideration.

The new clause and schedule relate to giving further relief from capital gains where deferred tax charges arise. However, the Financial Secretary did not put the emphasis on further relief but dealt with the detail, and I can understand why. Although the detail holds up to examination, the strategic approach does so to a lesser extent.

I do not want to go over the areas that the Financial Secretary covered in great depth but, as he explained, deferred charges arise in broadly two circumstances. The first is where deferral is allowed on an earlier disposal by one person, but where the cost of the asset to a successor or the cost of another asset to that person is correspondingly reduced. The second is under relieving provision where what would otherwise be a gain on a disposal is instead a charge on a subsequent event.

Before setting the latest concession and generosity to capital gains tax payers in its proper context, I should like to raise some points of detail with the Financial Secretary. The first is the obvious one. The Red Book estimate does not allow for the cost of the amendments that the Government are proposing, although there must be some cost. When the Financial Secretary replies to the debate, will he tell us his estimate of the cost to the Revenue of making that concession, if he believes that there will be such a cost? I believe that there must be a cost. If there are no such estimates, how does the Financial Secretary account for that?

My second point goes right to the heart of the Financial Secretary's explanation and relates to the arbitrary nature of the proposals. We accept that the cut-off point in the existing legislation is somewhat arbitrary, but that is inevitable. There will always be people who could have taken advantage of taxation changes if they had known about them. That would be the case under any taxation system and indeed it would not be possible to devise a taxation system where that would not arise. However, that does not necessarily mean that any group of people who complain that they have been disadvantaged should be able to ask for a concession, yet that is what has happened in this case.

The method of relief itself is entirely arbitrary. Although an asset to be disposed of may have only one day's worth of pre-March 1982 deferred gain—that is an extreme example, but it is possible—half the gain would be untaxed, and that is on top of the indexation and annual expenditure. Giving what amounts to 50 per cent. relief of gains on rolled-over business assets could weaken the incentive to reinvest in order to get the deferral. That is another criticism of the scheme and is a point to which the Financial Secretary should respond.

There is a strategic context to the current concession which really upsets the Opposition. I am sure that the Financial Secretary is not surprised about that. Capital gains stand at record levels, yet the number of people who are paying capital gains tax has decreased from 225,000 in 1978-79 to only 120,000 in 1983-84. Funnily enough, that is the latest year for which the figures are available for comparison. That decline is significant, yet those 120,000 people—the number may be smaller now—are to be given a further concession to help them to maximise their existing advantages in relation to the taxman.

[Mr. Nicholas Brown]

In the past year, rich taxpayers saved themselves £1·2 billion in capital gains tax. That is enough to make a substantial impact on, to take an obvious example, hospital revitalisation, or on all the areas of public expenditure to which the parliamentary Labour party is so committed, and the interests of which the Government always seem to discount.

The top rate taxpayer has probably saved some £25,000 cumulatively in capital gains tax since 1979. That concession is not going to those who most need it; it is going to those who least need it. The Opposition stand firmly against that approach. That theme has underlined each of our debates on the Finance Bill, and was carried through Second Reading.

Treasury Ministers have omitted to mention that the Budget measures will reduce the capital gains tax paid by top rate taxpayers by some £50 million in 1988-89. The Labour party cannot support such a loss of revenue.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Top rate taxpayers will pay more.

Mr. Brown: I understand the sedentary intervention from the Conservative Benches, but the argument is between expenditure on public services, to which the Labour party is committed, and concessions to top rate taxpayers to which the Conservative party and the Government are still more committed. That issue divides us and goes to the heart of the debate.

Because of the definition of the tax, there can be no poor capital gains tax payers. Conservative Members seem to find that an astounding premise.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I wonder if I heard him correctly. Did he speak about the reduction in the rate of capital gains tax applied to top rate taxpayers? If he did, he has missed the point completely. The rate of capital gains tax that applies to top rate taxpayers is now the top rate income tax—40 per cent.—it has gone up, not down. It seems that the last five minutes of the hon. Gentleman's speech has been completely irrelevant.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman has misunderstood me. I am talking about the take from capital gains tax as a result of the new clause. [Interruption.] I have received some very good advice from the Conservative Back Benches, which is to ignore the interventions of other Conservative Members. That is probably right. Perhaps Conservative Members are motivated by some deep personal resentment that they will not be able to take maximum advantage of the concession. If that was an unworthy remark, of course I withdraw it.

Despite unheard-of capital gains, the City of London is paying less than it should pay in capital gains tax, because of bed and breakfasting. The Exchequer is undoubtedly losing hundreds of millions of pounds because of bed and breakfasting. When we last debated this matter on the Floor of the House, the Financial Secretary said that he rather approved of bed and breakfasting and that he was not proposing measures that would stop bed and breakfasting as a taxation loophole. I do not know whether the Government's position on that has changed.

In the endeavour to put forward a constructive alternative to how the Government should spend the money that they will put into quite an important concession, I shall treat the House to the results of a parliamentary question which I put to the Secretary of State for Social Services. I asked whether he would publish tables showing the expenditure and benefit figures relating to poor families in Kensington—to take an area at random. I notice that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury has perked up. At last I have caught his interest.

The figures reveal that, contrary to the Government's assertions, the poorest households in Kensington will be net losers under the new benefit system introduced in April. They show the weekly spending power of families on low wages after tax and benefits as it would have been under the 1987-88 benefit system, if it had been maintained and updated in line with inflation, compared with what it will be under the new system. The figures are a shoddy contrast with the generosity of the Government's approach to those who pay capital gains tax. I understand that Conservative Members do not like a parallel to be drawn between those who will be advantaged under capital gains tax changes proposals and those who will be impoverished under the Government's social security proposals in Kensington and elsewhere.

4.45 pm

The theme of the Opposition's approach to the Budget, from Second Reading onwards, was that the Budget had a context. We hope to bring home that context to the country, although we realise that we will not change the Government's attitude. The figures—and they are the Government's figures—show that in Kensington a married couple with two children will be worse off if they are on wages between £70 and £110 a week. They will lose up to £1·95 a week. They will not be recipients of the Government's generosity to capital gains taxpayers.

Nor will a lone parent with two children, who stands to lose up to one tenth of his or her weekly earnings—if he or she is earning between £60 and £170 a week—as a result of the Government's benefit changes. All the one-parent families shown in the tables are net losers, losing between £2 and £8·79 a week. Those figures underestimate the loss that many families will suffer, as they do not take into account average water rates of about £1·78 a week which are no longer covered by housing benefit.

Those people do not pay capital gains tax and they will not benefit from the Government's new clause. They represent the generality of the population, rather than the 120,000 privileged few, who are privileged to have the capital gains in the first place and privileged to be able to take advantage of the new loopholes. That is what the Government are all about—capital gains tax concessions for the rich and benefit losses for the poor, particularly the poor in Kensington.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I listened with great care to the speech of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), but I could not follow what relevance much of it had to new clause 23.

Ms. Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): That is because the hon. Gentleman was not listening.

Mr. Smith: I have just said that I listened with great care. Clearly, the hon. Lady is not listening. I did not see what relevance the hon. Gentleman's speech had to new clause 23, which is entitled

"Deferred charges on gains before 31st March 1982".

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment, but first I should like to deal with some of the points that he raised. He referred to the fact that the number of capital gains tax payers had fallen in the past 10 years. Contrary to what he was suggesting, many people under the last Labour Government who were by no means wealthy had to pay capital gains tax. One of the welcome changes that the Government have made is to increase the threshold substantially to a level of £5,000 a year, which has reduced the number of capital gains tax payers but has not made a significant change to the yield from capital gains tax, which is still very substantial, and certainly will be next year, with the new 40 per cent. rate.

In regard to the change proposed in new clause 23, the hon. Gentleman suggested that it might be possible for a person to have held an asset for only one day before 31 March 1982. That is true, but it is equally true that a person might have held an asset for 17 years before that date. As I pointed out during our debate in Committee, the injustice of the previous situation was underlined by the fact that, during that 17-year period, inflation was 450 per cent. Many people were required to pay tax on gains that were not real. They were totally inflationary. A total of 450 per cent. had to be discounted from any gain before getting to the real element. I recall the debate when my hon. Friends the Members for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) and for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) raised that point.

My right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary put forward a balanced view. He dealt with the merits of the argument, which is not entirely on one side. I understand the point he made about the fact that some people did not defer their gain and realised their asset before 1988. They could argue that they had been placed at a disadvantage. Everybody must recognise that, however they plan their tax affairs—they may take the best advice—they may be disadvantaged by changes in the net Budget.

There is a strong case for making a change and I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary on the formula he has suggested. As he said, there seems to be an element of rough justice in this. I can see that in the absence of satisfactory records that has to be the case. Although it is only a short time since the Inland Revenue published a press release on the subject—I think it was on Friday—I have had a response from one tax partner in Deloitte Haskins and Sells. He said:

"So far as roll over relief is concerned, the news is excellent and I think that the Government have devised a very equitable and practical way of dealing with a difficult problem."

He said that he felt that in the case of holdover relief it might be possible to go a little further because usually only one asset is involved. However, my right hon. Friend said that even there, the records might not be available. I can see that this is the best solution in both cases and I welcome the new clause.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): We are entitled to know what the cost of the new measure will be to the community and other taxpayers who are paying ordinary rates of taxation. The Financial Secretary gave a figure of £50 million. That is in addition to the sum already prised from him on 18 December in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). It appears that the Government estimate that since 1979 the community has already lost £1·2 billion in capital gains tax and an additional £250 million has been forfeited by the Treasury in relaxations in capital transfer tax and inheritance tax. It is possible that the top 5 per cent. of taxpayers have enjoyed cumulative gains of about £25,000 each in the decade from such changes.

What is more disturbing is the evidence that the Government, in their headlong drive to reward the rich, have not included the cost of the Budget proposals to reduce capital gains tax in this financial year in the financial statement published in March. On 9 May the Financial Secretary said:

"it is estimated that under the Budget proposals the reduction in capital gains tax on gains realised in 1988-89 by the top 5 per cent. of income tax payers will be rather less than £50 million."—[Official Report, 9 May 1988; Vol. 133, c. 30.]

Page 40 of the Red Book shows that no such figure is included. It is incumbent on the Financial Secretary to explain that to us.

We also know from what the Financial Secretary has told us that a further £50 million is now to be sacrificed by the wider community to bring relief to the undeserving rich. It is a matter of concern to everybody that the new clause will give a further perk to the most wealthy. We know that the Chancellor has estimated that British people today can receive £1 million salaries and that by tax management, which involves, according to another answer, a mortgage of £30,000, a business expansion scheme investment of £40,000, an investment of £810,000 in the new enterprise zone unit trusts and a contribution to a retirement annuity scheme of £195,000, they can pay nothing in tax. Against that background it is inexplicable how a further new clause can be introduced which will give further handouts to the rich.

Already this year, following the Budget, £1·5 billion is being lost to the Exchequer in top rate tax allowances for the rich and a further £2 billion is being lost by Budget handouts to the top 1 per cent. of earners. We are entitled to a better justification from the Government than that given today. We are entitled to have the questions asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) answered in full by the Financial Secretary. We deserve a proper explanation and I hope that the Government will consider withdrawing new clause 23.

Mr. Oppenheim: My right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary said that disallowing relief to people who had amassed pre-1982 gains but rolled those over into another asset was rough justice. I should like to go a stage further and say that it is very rough justice. Many people rolled over their assets through no fault of their own but because they were forced to do so, perhaps under threat of compulsory purchase or because their property had been compulsorily purchased. If it is technically possible to allow 50 per cent. relief against pre-1982 gains on the rolled-over assets, why is it not possible to allow 100 per cent. relief? I do not see what the technical or administrative difference is.

The Opposition Front Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), calls this clause a tax concession for the rich. I invite the hon. Gentleman to come to my constituency. He will be made most welcome. I will introduce him to a gentleman who will be surprised to hear himself called rich or super rich. He is a very small dairy farmer who is farming over the border of my constituency in Nottinghamshire. He was under threat of compulsory purchase by British Coal some years ago because it wanted to grab his land for opencast mining. He was forced to sell it to British Coal on disadvantageous terms. He rolled that money over into a new farm.

He is far from being rich. He does not drive a Range Rover, wear a huskie or green wellington boots. He is being severely disadvantaged by the fact that his pre-1982 gains are being allowed relief at 50 per cent. If the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East would care to see me in the Lobby afterwards we can make a date. I shall buy him half a lager and he can explain to that gentleman why he regards him as rich. He will probably receive a dusty response.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I accept the hon. Gentleman's invitation. I should love to visit his constituency and his constituents and meet the dairy farmer to whom he referred. Perhaps at the same time we could have discussions about everything the Government have done for dairy farmers.

Mr. Oppenheim: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has graciously accepted my invitation. He will be made welcome. Perhaps we can liaise afterwards.

It is worth mentioning that, although there has been criticism and talk about the Government cutting tax for top rate taxpayers, it is worth remembering that the corollary of that is not only that they have wiped out a lot of perks that wealthier people used to enjoy, but top rate taxpayers will be paying more capital gains because they will pay capital gains on the same band as their income tax. Many people will be paying 40 per cent. capital gains instead of 30 per cent. Therefore, many people whom Opposition Members do not like—the rich and super-rich —will be paying more in capital gains. It is worth recognising that fact, because I suspect that that is in line with Labour's philosophy.

I understand that the Government's objective in banding capital gains with income tax rates is to prevent distortions. I put it to my right hon. Friend that there are still distortions. If one makes a capital loss on a bond but makes a profit from the income of that bond, one cannot be offset against the other. Therefore, it is at least debatable that there is still a distortion in the system. I ask my right hon. Friend to address himself to that point.

I am conscious that I have already taken up enough of the time of the House and that I have to make extensive arrangements for the official reception in my constituency of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East, so I shall pause in my oration.

5 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I apologise in advance for my ignorance. I did not serve on the Committee, so I am coming fresh to some of the arguments.

First, I reiterate the plea for more information from the Treasury about the cost implications of the concession, because that is important. If it is true that the Red Book guidelines do not reflect any charge, expenditure or change in the Government's Budget proposals as a result of this concession, that would certainly be important. My view of the new clause is not based on the principle; it is a question of balance and fine tuning. The amounts of money involved are an important factor in deciding whether the Government's judgment is right.

Some of the comments made by Labour Members cause me concern. From my experience in my constituency, I know that small business men and farmers have been severely prejudiced by previous provisions. The Minister may help the House if he can tell us whether he has received any proposals from the small business community and whether any farming institutions have made representations to him.

The Government's policies on farming—and particularly cereal farming—have required family farmers to make decisions about the disposal of their farms. I am sure that dairy farmers in Amber Valley are in the same position. Perhaps we should organise a bus run and the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) can buy us all half pints of lager. Perhaps we should all go to study the effects of Government policy on farmers.

Can the Minister give us a little more objective information about the people who will receive the concessions? Will they be people who could afford to pay, or will they be people who should benefit from the concessions? Is there a wider implication for small business men and farmers?

Capital taxation is not as important as direct and indirect taxation. Labour Members properly argue for a redistribution of wealth. However, the redistribution of wealth should be tackled by direct and indirect taxation. Capital taxation, if it is organised properly, should be part of the wealth-creating process. I should be grateful if the Minister would clarify some of those points. His answers will influence me in deciding whether to support the new clause.

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): We shall wait with interest to see what the Social and Liberal Democrats will do. We shall be waiting with bated breath. I am also interested that the trip being arranged by the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) is gathering support. Perhaps we should all go, suitably fortified by a half pint of lager, to see the plight of the unfortunate farmer.

When the new clause was tabled we debated why it was necessary and desirable to wipe out gains made before 1982. The Government told us that there was an element of rough justice and that it was an arbitrary date. They said that it was difficult to find records before 1982, and apparently records could be found after that. They gave no satisfactory answer. The Opposition were left with the impression that the Government simply wanted to lift the burden from those who would have been liable to pay capital gains tax. Many people have made gains that were not accounted for because of inflation prior to 1982 and will receive great benefits under the proposals.

I disagree with the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) in his assessment of the importance of capital taxation. It is very important, and the longer the Government remain in office, the more important it will be. There is no doubt that the amassing of capital and the building of capital will play an important part in the assembling of wealth, and we shall have to consider that.

At first sight, new clause 23 does not generate much excitement. We had rehearsed in Committee all the arguments about why we thought that the proposals were bad, both because of the amount of tax forgone, which could have been better spent on the Health Service and because they were indicative of the Government's general policy to help the wealthy. I accept that there are many people who pay capital gains whom one would not call very wealthy or even wealthy. However, the main thrust of the Bill is to help those who are better off. That contrasts dramatically with the Government's attitude to those who receive social security and those on low incomes or with no income at all, whom they do not seem to accommodate in the same way.

I have two questions for the Financial Secretary. First, there is always an element of rough justice in fiscal changes, but why did the Government decide to benefit those who, by definition, have had a tax advantage some time ago? As I understand it, people who took advantage of rollover relief some time after 1982 on a gain incurred prior to 1982 will now receive the added bonus of a 50 per cent. exemption. They have already taken advantage of a tax break by getting rollover relief. Why are the Government helping those people any more than those unfortunate enough to have given away their asset before 1988—they may have divested themselves of an asset to a relative or sold it—without the benefit of rollover relief and who have to pay capital gains tax?

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury knows of a constituent of mine, who is a doctor, who gave away an asset in 1985. I expect that he will want to know why he will not get the benefit of any favours. I made no bones about the fact that I was not particularly sympathetic to him, and that I do not like retrospective legislation in principle—although I accept that it is occasionally necessary in special circumstances. Why do the Government seek to help people who have already taken advantage of a tax break? If rollover relief was designed to ease the tax burden, that should have been enough in itself. Why do the Government propose to reduce capital gains tax in such cases by half?

There is the added point that the gain prior to 1982 could have been a minuscule part of the whole gain. Someone may have acquired the asset a few weeks or months before the 1982 cut-off date. Why should such people be able to take advantage of the whole reduction?

I shall quote example 4 in the Treasury press release to illustrate my argument:

"1980 Taxpayer A acquires a business asset

1983 A replaces the asset and claims deferral under Section 115 Capital Gains Tax Act 1979.

1987 The replacement asset is given to B, and deferral is claimed under Section 79 Finance Act 1980.

1989 B emigrates"—

no doubt to sunnier climes—

"and the gain deferred in 1987 is brought into charge under Section 79 Finance Act 1981.

The gain deferred in 1987 is in part attributable indirectly to the disposal by A in 1983 of an asset which A acquired before 31 March 1982."

The point is that this particular taxpayer has already on two occasions taken advantage of existing legislation to mitigate the amount of tax that he had to pay. It is now proposed that he should have an added advantage. That is all very well and I do not begrudge anybody who is fortunate enough to be in that position that advantage, but it contrasts with the shameful treatment meted out to other taxpayers and others in receipt of money from the state.

Such a concession is not granted on social security matters or to ordinary basic rate taxpayers, who have been hard hit. It is only this special category who receive this advantage, and I suspect that a great deal of lobbying has been done on their behalf by professionals and accountants. It is unfair, but rather typical of the way that the Government have dealt with the Finance Bill. They bend over backwards to help people who, generally speaking, are not in need of the same degree of help as those who have fallen on the wrong side of the Government's fence.

I hope that the Financial Secretary will tell us why people who have already been catered for are being catered for again. Can he say whether in future the Government will be so charitable to those who so far have felt nothing but the wrong side of the Government's hand in terms of their tax treatment?

Mr. Norman Lamont: The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) said that we had not considered seriously enough another option, which was to do nothing. Perhaps I did not make the case clear enough: that would have been wrong in terms of justice. We have said that we think it wrong that people should be paying capital gains tax on highly inflationary gains made in the 1970s, which is why we introduced rebasing. Once we introduced that, it was logical to extend something similar to people who are deferring capital gains.

Deferral is a long-standing system, not a tax dodge as the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) seems to think. People defer tax, but must ultimately pay it. If within that rolled-over or deferred gain there is an element of inflationary gain, that is pre-1982. Given that we have already decided that we would do something about the pre-1982 gain, there is obviously a case for considering this for the rolled-over or deferred gain.

I shall come to the details shortly. Part of this applies to businesses. This is a normal commercial transaction and it has been allowed in the tax system for a long time. It follows logically that if one is to rebase, one should look at the case for doing it with rolled-over gains as well.

Mr. Darling: I did not say that this was a tax dodge and I do not remember using those words. But without doubt it is a concession and an advantage not to have to pay capital gains tax when it would otherwise fall. That advantage is rollover relief, which both parties supported; that having been given, why is a further benefit to be given?

Mr. Lamont: Rollover relief, which is a long-standing feature of the CGT system, applies in carefully defined circumstances. It applies to businesses, but not to equity investment—I think rightly, although I have not managed to convince all my hon. Friends of that. Once there is rollover relief and if one is to give a degree of remedy for inflationary gain in the normal taxation of capital gains, obviously one should also consider the position of deferred gains.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East ignored some recent developments and Budget provisions. He ignored the fact that we have increased CGT for higher rate taxpayers to 40 per cent. and that the threshold for capital gains is to be reduced to £5,000. I know that Opposition Members think that that is far too generous. Earlier they made it clear that they wanted to abolish the exemption completely and to bring 10 million people into CGT for the first time. They do not seem to know that one third of CGT payers are basic rate payers. They are not the super-rich who seem so to obsess the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek).

Some Opposition Members seem to think that the CGT yield is declining, but the opposite is true. The yield has increased four times since 1979. We are moving into a fairer world in which people are prepared to unlock their assets and pay tax. That is why the yield from all capital taxes has increased under this Government, unlike what happened under the Labour Government with their punitive rates on other capital taxes. The take from CGT is £2 billion a year—just enough to pay for the increases in social security, which hon. Gentlemen somewhat irrelevantly but consistently mentioned.

Hon. Gentlemen asked about the cost. I said that the cost of the concession might be £50 million, of which £20 million would go to companies. There is no mystery about it not being in the Red Book. It was in the press release and in the notes on clauses that I made available and about which I wrote to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown).

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I know that the Minister will tell us what the overall cost to the Exchequer will be more definitively and I am enjoying his rumbustious speech, as always. But he is misrepresenting the Labour party's position when he refers to abolishing thresholds entirely. That is not our position.

Mr. Lamont: That is what appeared to be said when we debated this subject on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: This argument has been made mischievously and I am sure in a light-hearted vein from the Government Front Bench before. It was put to the Minister as a possible option which the Government should have considered. It most certainly was not put to him as a final and definitive statement of our policy.

Mr. Lamont: As I understand it, the hon. Gentleman is not saying that the Labour party is definitely committed to bringing an extra 10 million people into CGT, but it is considering that seriously and will get its policy review to study it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) thought that perhaps this was too rough justice. His argument was: if we could have 50 per cent. relief, what was the technical difficulty about having 100 per cent. relief? There is no technical difficulty. It is just that it would be inappropriate. The alternative to 50 per cent. is not 100 per cent. It is to give a separate concession to those with precise records. I explained carefully and at length why that was not possible. I repeat that although we have decided to make this concession, I strongly believe that this is a matter of balance. The case is not overwhelming.

Some people are receiving a retrospective benefit which they did not expect when their gains were established perhaps some time ago. For some this will be more advantageous and for others it will be disadvantageous. If we ran two systems and allowed people to choose between what we are proposing and another system, where perhaps those with precise records could choose, it would undoubtedly be a one-way bet and those for whom the concession was in a sense over-generous would certainly make their decisions that way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley raised the subject of rollover relief coming from compulsory purchase. One must be sympathetic to that. I see his point, but we could not run a different system for different types of capital gains. In any case, even with something that arose from compulsory purchase, the same problems of trying to apportion the gain before and after 1982 would still arise, and there might be a complicated interaction, with the proceeds of the compulsory purchase going into different assets. It would not be easy.

My hon. Friend also referred to losses on the sale of bonds not being offsetable against income from bonds. That is true. Leaving aside the general issue of allowing capital losses against income, which would be expensive and which we have always resisted—it would run into billions of pounds—my hon. Friend will be aware that bonds are generally outside the CGT net altogether. One of the effects of this concession will be to allow rollover relief into convertibles. I stress to my hon. Friend that we are not integrating income tax and capital gains tax. We have aligned the rates, but we are not moving towards complete integration of the two taxes.

Mr. Oppenheim: I may be wrong, but I had understood that most types of gilts were outside the capital gains net; but other types of bonds, such as Eurobonds and a variety of other fixed interest instruments, would come within the net. I did not mention gilts; I specifically mentioned bonds for that reason.

Mr. Lamont: The concession goes beyond gilts. If my hon. Friend wants me to be more precise about that, I shall have to let him have further details later.

Although this solution is somewhat rough and ready, we have addressed a real problem. When people have given gifts with deferred and accrued gains, or when they have rolled over assets, it is right that there should be some relief for them against inflationary gains, just as we have introduced that for taxpayers generally for pre-1982 inflationary gains. I cannot see why the Opposition should regard that as so unjust. It follows from what we put forward in the original Budget measures. I believe it will be widely welcomed, especially by the business community.

I have given the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) the figure for businesses, but I cannot give him the figure for small businesses. I invite my right hon. and hon. Friends to support the new clause.

Dr. Marek: It was refreshing to hear the Financial Secretary giving a balanced view of the new clause and being honest about what he thought of it. He said that there were arguments in both directions but that he was persuaded by the arguments and representations that had been made to him. It will come as no surprise to him to learn that, having listened to the arguments from Conservative Members and others, we have come to the conclusion that, on balance, the new clause should not be part of the Bill.

I listened to the Financial Secretary seriously and with interest. It is a surprise to hear his hon. Friends on the Back Benches, who always seem to be pleading special cases, probably on behalf of clients sitting in the Gallery. The Register of Members' interests shows that the hon.

Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) has two directorships—of What to Buy plc and of World Opinion Ltd. Presumably he will not recommend that his clients buy farm land.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) also spoke. I see that he is a consultant to Price Waterhouse, Accountancy Age, the Financial Intermediaries, Managers and Brokers Regulatory Association, Rediffusion Business Electronics Ltd. and British Venture Capital Association. I make no complaint about that. I just wonder whether the sort of people to whom he is a consultant have an interest in the new clause being passed and in the gains that they would make if it were.

The Register of Members' Interests can be referred to by any hon. Member. It is possible to question whether the hon. Member for Beaconsfield speaks from the heart and really believes what he says or whether, given that in another walk of life he advises people how to avoid paying tax, he sees an opportunity here to please his clients.

Mr. Oppenheim: It is comforting to think that the hon. Gentleman has gone to the trouble of doing some research into my business background. It is a shame that his research was not more thorough. If he had done it properly he would have discovered that What to Buy put out a publication that looks into office equipment and information technology—so it is highly unlikely that it would recommend that its subscribers buy farmland.

Dr. Marek: I am pleased to hear that. My research was done quickly by consulting the Register of Members' Interests that lies on the Table. No doubt the hon. Gentleman will enter his directorships and consultancies in it so that we can have a better idea of them when he rises in future debates on financial matters.

When Conservative Back Benchers talk about avoiding distortions of the tax system I get the message that they regard paying any tax as a distortion. If their supporters could pay no tax there would be no distortion. My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) gave the numbers of capital gains tax payers, I believe for 1983-84, when there were 120,000 of them. They are the better-off people in society. Many of my constituents would not know what capital gains were, let alone have to pay tax on them. A small band of privileged people exercise their patronage through their power, wealth and ability to make capital gains. No doubt they see their interests clearly and will write to the Financial Secretary about them.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Are the one third of capital gains tax payers who pay tax at the basic rate an exception to what the hon. Gentleman is saying?

Dr. Marek: I shall make that clear later. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Beaconsfield can contain himself until then, I shall deal with that point later. Of course, capital gains tax can be paid by people who are only moderately wealthy, but it is also paid by the super-rich. There are cases such as that mentioned by the hon. Member for Amber Valley in which a person is genuinely hard done by because of forces outside of his or her control. In that case British Coal wanted to buy the land and the person, although he wanted to, could not continue farming. There are such cases, but the solution does not lie in what the Government propose. The solution is to deal with the problem of enabling people to pass down businesses. The Government should have turned their attention to that.

There are problems in farming and they should be solved by the Government turning their attention to enabling farmers to pass on their farms as working concerns to other people without having to leave the industry or being penalised any more than they should be by capital gains tax.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) that people should pay capital gains tax if they make capital gains, and that is the central point. The problem with the clause is that the Government decided to rebase the gains and to give a tax giveaway to the rich, but missed out some of the rich. Those whom they missed out wrote to the Financial Secretary and said, "Look here, what is going on? Your are giving all these people, because of rebasing—never mind whether it is because of inflation—a tax handout that you are not giving me." I give the Government their due; they recognise their own. The Financial Secretary immediately took it to heart and said, "Yes, there must be more pig swill in the troughs so that everyone can put their snouts into it." That is precisely what they have done.

5.30 pm

Mr. Tim Smith: The hon. Gentleman can do better than this.

Dr. Marek: I will. I am being objective.

When an error was discovered in the figures for pension payments, an error that resulted in pensioners not receiving—[Interruption.] Having lost the argument, Tory Members are not able to come back with any genuine point on what I am saying and instead are diverting the attention of the House by making irrelevant comments. I wish they would not.

When the Government made a mistake in the pension payment figures and were underpaying pensioners by about £1 million a year, did they increase the pension for those who had lost money because of that error?

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): Boring.

Dr. Marek: It may be boring for the hon. Gentleman, but it was not for the pensioners who lost money because of that error. I accept that that error was not made deliberately. However, instead of giving the money back to the pensioners and putting up the pensions by 0·1 per cent. or 0·2 per cent. above the usual uprating, the Government gave that money to charity.

That treatment of ordinary working men and women was completely different from the treatment given to people who make capital gains and pay capital gains tax. If people are rich and pay capital gains tax, they expect and receive all the benefits and the attention of the Government to ensure that they do not go without anything that someone else already has. The Government are not especially interested in the ordinary person on the street, the pensioner or someone with not a great deal of money, so all they promised was that the money would be given to charity. They are not interested in increasing the pensions more than they have to.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Will the hon. Gentleman now answer my earlier question? Are the one third of capital gains taxpayers who are basic rate income taxpayers an exception to the remarks that he is making?

Dr. Marek: Only the top 5 per cent. of taxpayers pay the top rate of income tax, so not many people will pay 40p in the pound. It is precisely those people about whom I am talking—those who are rich and have far more wealth, patronage and power than the ordinary man in the street and more money than almost all of my constituents even dream about. That is a clear answer to the Financial Secretary's question.

The Opposition are not enamoured of the new clause. We believe that it is yet another concession of £50 million or £20 million, or whatever the Financial Secretary said. I have forgotten now, but I will read it in the Official Report tomorrow. That money could have been given to renovating our schools, to funding fully the nurses' pay award, to getting our infrastructure into better shape, to building our roads or railways, to building more hospitals or to almost any other sphere of public life that desperately needs more money. Instead, the Government have chosen to give it to the rich who have already been given more money than ever before. We cannot support the new clause and I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against it.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New clause 3

INTEREST RATES

'In section 378 (3) (e) of the Taxes Act 1988 there shall be added at the end "and—(b) in particular for the publication of statistics on a monthly basis setting down prevailing levels of interest rates from a representative sample of market rates for mortgage lending, bank lending and other consumer credit".'.—[Mr. Chris Smith.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Chris Smith: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause requires the Government to publish monthly comparative figures of the varying rates of credit available to consumers from mortgage lending institutions —building societies, banks and other finance institutions and stores. It is important for consumers to have access to the fullest possible, independently presented information about the rates of credit available to them. That is especially important in the present circumstances because of the enormous variation in the interest rates available for credit. I must pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), who has already raised this issue in a Bill that he presented to the House.

The available rates of credit show an enormous variation. An overdraft is available from the bank at between 14 and 17 per cent., plus bank charges. Personal loans may be available from a high street bank at between 19·5 and 20·75 per cent. Interest rates on Access and on Barclay's Visa cards range between 23 and 24 per cent.

[Mr. Chris Smith]

annual percentage rate. The Chase Manhattan Visa card, which has recently been introduced, is somewhat cheaper, at 16·9 per cent. APR.

If one goes along to the gas board showroom in the high street and wishes to purchase an item on hire purchase credit, one will find that the rate varies between 30 and 35 per cent. APR. The higher figure is the one charged to cash customers, which is blatant discrimination against people who do not have bank accounts.

The rates available on different store cards vary even more dramatically. Yesterday, I carried out a random survey of store card and store credit rates of interest in an average British high street. Perhaps I should not call it an average British high street, as it was Kensington high street. I discovered that various rates of credit are available in the major stores there. At Dixons, they range from 29·8 to 39·9 per cent. and at Next from 26·8 to 32·9 per cent. At Marks and Spencer, the rate is 26·8 per cent. At Barkers, on the Frasercard system, the rate is 29·8 per cent. At BHS, the rate is between 29 and 34·7 per cent.

In that welter of available mainstream high street credit, there is surely a crucial need for information to enable consumers to make well-judged choices and decisions. That may be all very well for the high street stores, but the back-street loan sharks are infinitely worse. Last year, Birmingham city council and Birmingham money advice centre carried out a joint survey which found that annual percentage rates for the back-street merchants in their area ranged from 153 per cent. up to a staggering 4,822 per cent. They also found that one local firm, S and U Stores, told its customers that the APR on the credit that it made available was 54 per cent. That in itself would have been bad enough, but, when the collection charges that the borrower had to pay were included, the real cost of borrowing was 835 per cent.

There is not only an enormously wide variety in the rates of credit available, but far more credit is being offered to and thrust at the public than ever before. Outstanding consumer credit has risen by an average of about 15 per cent. a year over the past four years. Last year, to October, it was even worse. It rose by 18·7 per cent. and it is becoming worse still.

Mr. Tim Smith: Will the hon. Gentleman tell us whether those figures include credit advance for house purchase and, if so, what proportion that represents?

Mr. Chris Smith: They do and, of course, the mortgage finance available is a crucial component part. It accounts for about three quarters of the overall credit figures. That does not make the point any less valid because, to an increasing extent, people are borrowing money on mortgages against the value of their house and spending that money on items other than housing. That is borrowing against security, but it is borrowing none the less.

The amount of outstanding consumer credit is rising in real terms. It is rising on a per person basis and as a percentage of GDP. It is also worth pointing out that Britain makes far more use of credit cards than any other EEC country. In this country, we hold about half the Visa cards in the entire Community and two fifths of the Eurocards were issued in the United Kingdom.

The problem is further highlighted by yesterday's figures on bank lending which were issued by the Bank of England. They showed that lending in the personal sector —again, lending ostensibly for house purchase formed a major part of that—rose by 7 per cent. in the three months to March. That is a rise of £4·4 billion compared with £3·2 billion in the three months to February. The money borrowed as part of those figures for house purchase both feeds on and fuels the massive rises in property prices which have taken place, especially in London and the south-east, during the last couple of years.

There was one slightly brighter point about the figures issued yesterday by the Bank of England. There was a considerable increase in industrial borrowing, and we hope that that is a sign that industry is now tentatively beginning to improve its investment performance, but that fact must not be allowed to mask the dramatic increases in individual, personal, domestic borrowing that yesterday's figures revealed.

Many problems are inevitably coming in train from that increase in borrowing. For example, personal savings are at their lowest for 26 years. When I asked the Prime Minister about that, she came out with a remarkable doctrine. In a letter to me of 16 February 1988 she seemed to claim that because there was greater confidence in the economy people felt that they could save less and spend more. She might care to tell that to the most prosperous and best performing economy in the world, Japan, because a large part of its economic success has been built precisely on high levels of personal saving.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): So that the House may judge whether the interpretation that the hon. Gentleman put on the letter that he received from the Prime Minister is correct, will he read the relevant passage to the House?

Mr. Smith: I shall be delighted to do so. The relevant paragraph—the third—in the Prime Minister's letter says:

"One reason for the fall in the ratio during the 1980s has probably been the reversal of that unsatisfactory position."

The Prime Minister had earlier in her letter been conducting her usual diatribe against the 1970s. She went on:

"Inflation has been brought down to levels last experienced in the 1960s and, with greater confidence in the future, consumers are now in a position to save a smaller share of their real incomes and enjoy higher spending and living standards".

As an economic doctrine about the role of savings within an economy, that is astounding and somewhat peculiar in its economic logic.

We have a picture of personal savings at an extremely low level.

Mr. Oppenheim: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: I should like to get on with my point. I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in due course if he lets me continue for the moment.

The reality is rather different from that painted by the Prime Minister. For example, the Office of Fair Trading has estimated that more than 3 million adults have experienced difficulty in keeping up with their debt repayments during the past five years. That is the reality of the credit society that we in Britain have been building during the past seven or eight years.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) talked about people raising finance for house purchase. He will also be aware that repossessions of homes for mortgage arrears have risen fivefold in the past eight years. He will also doubtless be aware that the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux has recorded a doubling during that period of counselling on consumer debt and related items. Last year the citizens advice bureaux dealt with 1·4 million cases of debt counselling.

Personal indebtedness is a major and growing problem for many families and the more that credit is pushed upon them, sold to them in the glossiest and, in some cases, most misleading of ways, and the more that families are given insufficient information on which to make judgments, the more they will face problems of eventual indebtedness.

The growth of credit is bad enough for individuals; it is disastrous for the economy as a whole. The prosperity that parts of Britain—I emphasise parts—have been experiencing in the past couple of years has been built on a bubble of ever-expanding credit. It cannot go on for ever.

Yet the Chancellor's only response to the problem of credit expansion has been an idle and negligent one. His only answer is to adjust interest rates. Indeed, he reiterated that last Thursday in a speech to the Cities of London and Westminster Conservative Association's annual lunch. Where else should it have been held but at the Savoy hotel.

The Chancellor spoke about the problems of borrowing and credit. He made the somewhat surprising claim that fiscal policy was more or less unrelated to the availability of credit and levels of inflationary consumption. He seemed to be unaware of the fact that those people lucky enough to have benefited from the dramatic reductions in top rate tax in his Budget were unlikely to go out and spend the money that the Budget was giving them. He also ruled out any control of credit by the Government as being "a distortion of the market".

Mr. Oppenheim: The hon. Gentleman makes a case that the savings ratio in Britain has fallen somewhat in recent years, but is it not true that the ratio of public debt has also fallen somewhat, and that contrasts rather dramatically with the situation in the 1970s when we had high public debt and relatively low private debt? May I further take him up on his comparison with Japan? He says that Japan has consistently had a high savings ratio and that is supposedly one of the main reasons for its success. But the fact is that in the 1960s and 1970s Britain's savings ratio was as high as Japan's, and that did not do us much good. One reason why it did not do us much good is that, whereas the Japanese had a low level of public debt and public spending, we had a high level of public debt and public spending. May I also ask whether, as a matter of interest, it is possible nowadays to join the Labour party on a credit card?

Mr. Smith: I shall deal with the hon. Gentleman's substantive points, which I think related to the balance in the overall economy between public and private debt. The hon. Gentleman ignores the need in any economy to have a healthy supply of credit within the private sector. I shall come to that in a minute, because the crucial factor there is the word "healthy".

But that is also a principle which should be applied to the public sector. To make a virtue, as the Chancellor seems to have been doing in the course of his various pronouncements in the past few months, of having a minus figure for his public sector borrowing requirement is not necessarily a sensible way of planning for future investment in Britain's health, welfare and future wealth-creating capacity. That is an issue to which we shall doubtless return on many occasions in the next few months and years.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury appears puzzled. I was making the basic point that for the Chancellor to claim that there is some necessary virtue in having a public sector borrowing surplus rather than a public sector borrowing deficit is not necessarily a sensible economic approach to running the national economy.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Major): Is the hon. Gentleman therefore suggesting precisely the converse, that it is more virtuous for the Government to have a borrowing requirement than to be in surplus? Is that the Labour party's policy now?

Mr. Smith: No, it depends inevitably on the supply of revenue to the Government and on what the Government wish to spend their money on. In current circumstances, when the Government have more money than they know sensibly what to do with, and, instead of doing what they should have done and investing properly in our Health Service, house building, education and local services, they have given money to top rate taxpayers, they have the balance wrong within their own overall budgetary levels.

Inevitably, from time to time, a Government will need to borrow. There will be times when a Government want to be in surplus. It all depends on the circumstances at the time. However, I suspect that making a virtue of the great motif of Government economic policy that the PSBR must always be in surplus, which seems to be the Chancellor of the Exchequer's current view, will haunt the Chancellor when economic circumstances change. The Chief Secretary to the Treasury ignored the fact that economic circumstances will change and are changing. One of the problems that will fuel the change is precisely the level of available credit and borrowing.

Mr. Major: I fear that the hon. Gentleman is misleading the House unintentionally. He equated the desirability, as he saw it, of the PSBR to necessary investment, also as he saw it, in public sector services. He thereby implied, and the Labour party states this frequently, that there is under-investment in those services. Perhaps he will remind the House of the level of public sector capital investment in the current year and the extent by which expenditure on priority programmes has increased in the past public expenditure round.

Mr. Smith: Yes. I can also remind the Chief Secretary of the needs that are not being met and which should be met by the Government in their current public expenditure provision.

I remind the Government of the desperate needs of the Health Service and the issues raised earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley), who referred to the way in which the Government have failed to fund fully the nurses' pay award. The Government are neglecting much in public financial provision. Instead of thinking that they have done everything that they need to do, they should consider the needs that are not being met, and which they should be meeting.

Referring once more to the nub of the proposition under discussion—personal sector borrowing and the way in which personal credit is expanding—the Government's only answer is to say that we must adjust interest rates. At the same time, they rule out the possibility of alternatives such as any direct control of credit. They claim that high basic interest rates will solve the problem. They will not. High basic interest rates have very little impact on consumer credit consumption because the margins between base rate and consumer rates are so high.

High basic interest rates will have a direct impact on the mortgage rate. Any further rise in the mortgage rate—which must be imminent now—will have only temporary macroeconomic benefits while harming directly many millions of home owners. Higher interest rates do not appear to take much of the steam out of the credit boom, but they increase the risk of default.

In addition, high basic interest rates make life much more difficult for British business. The Confederation of British Industry estimates that the most recent five changes in interest rates have cost British industry about £625 million.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I have been following the hon. Gentleman's arguments with some care. Before he refers in detail to business interest charges, will he explain in the light of his statement that personal borrowing, particularly on credit cards, is dangerous for the economy and the individual, how he would discourage people from using credit cards? Would the Labour party introduce a tax on credit cards?

6.15 pm

Mr. Smith: "No" is the short answer to that. The hon. Gentleman quite clearly has not listened to me with care. The proposition that I have been advancing is not that personal borrowing per se is bad, but that personal borrowing either at usurious rates of interest or when rising out of control, is not necessarily in the best interests of consumers or the economy as a whole. The key point is to ensure that the growth of consumer credit is kept properly under control

Mr. Hanley: How?

Mr. Smith: I was coming to that. It is not being kept properly under control at the moment. At the moment supply imposes more credit on consumers than they want or need.

The National Consumer Council has provided the answer to the question raised by the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley). It wants better protection for consumers and it has stated that fact clearly in many papers and statements over the past year. However, none of those documents relates directly to the new clause, so I will not refer to them in detail.

The Director General of Fair Trading also wants better protection for consumers and in his annual report he makes precisely the point made in new clause 3. In his annual report, Sir Gordon Borrie states:

"For credit to be used successfully"—

hon. Members should notice that Sir Gordon, like Opposition Members, wants credit to be used successfully because it has a major, important and beneficial role to play in an economy provided that it is used successfully—

"there are two vital prerequisites—first both parties must know what they are letting themselves in for; and second credit must be both given and taken responsibly. This means that, if there are to be improvements, both lenders and borrowers must be better informed and both must demonstrate the highest standards of moral responsibility."

Better information is precisely what new clause 3 is about. The Opposition entirely agree with Sir Gordon Borrie, and the new clause is a first step towards a better informed consumer market better able to judge, discern and choose between available credit. New clause 3 will also assist the ability to make demand the arbiter of credit rather than supply. At present, supply dictates and credit is effectively on the loose.

If Conservative Members are not prepared to listen to me, to Sir Gordon Borrie or to the National Consumer Council, they might listen to what The Times stated this morning. The Times comments on the latest figures on bank lending. While welcoming the improvement in the figures in industrial borrowing, it describes the present state of affairs graphically as "a candy floss society busy spending its way towards the next balance of payments crisis."

That is precisely what is happening, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer sits back and believes that an adjustment of a half per cent. here or there in the base rate is sufficient to make amends. It is not. The least that the Government can do is to accept the logic of our case, accept the dangers inherent in the present situation, and accept our new clause to provide consumers with at least basic information about the rates of credit that are available to them, to enable them to make informed choices rather than uninformed choices, as they are doing at the moment.

Mr. Gow: This debate takes place in the benign presence of the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon). He had to listen, as you had to listen, Mr. Speaker, to the speech of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). You are a keen student, Mr. Speaker, as I am, of missives that were sent by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne and by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) to Dr. Johannes Witteveen. On the desk in the study at our house in the republic of Lambeth there is a copy of the famous letter dated 15 December 1976.

By one of the strange accidents of events, I happened to re-read that letter this morning. The right hon. Member for Leeds, East assisted in drafting the letter. The then Labour Government embarked upon precisely that policy of borrowing that is, once again, advocated by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne approved the Chancellor of the Exchequer's draft commitment to reduce public borrowing and the share of public expenditure as a proportion of gross domestic product.

On that famous day, just before Christmas 1976, there was the beginning of an understanding of the need to restrain borrowing. [Interruption.] I should not be rebuked by Opposition Members for talking about borrowing. The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury spent little time talking about new clause 3, but he spent considerable time redefining the Labour party's borrowing policies. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury was perfectly justified in intervening twice during the hon. Gentleman's speech to try to educate him in the lessons that were learnt 12 years ago by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne, who is sitting only two Benches behind the hon.

Gentleman. We have heard the hon. Gentleman disagree with all the lessons that were learnt so painfully by the Labour Government in 1976.

Mr. Chris Smith: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gow: Of course I shall give way. The more the hon. Gentleman seeks to intervene, the more I shall certainly give way.

Mr. Smith: I am delighted to receive such a ready reception from the hon. Gentleman. When he forecast a public sector borrowing requirement of £4 billion in 1986 and said that that was just about the right sort of borrowing level for the economy that year, was the Chancellor of the Exchequer being sensible, wise or foolish?

Mr. Gow: When my right hon. Friend the Chancellor presented his Budget statement in 1986, he made a forecast about the then borrowing requirement. He said that, in the conditions of 1986, it was correct to adopt a borrowing requirement of about the figure that the hon. Gentleman gave. Then, in 1987, my right hon. Friend budgeted for a small public sector borrowing requirement, but, as it turned out, there was a surplus or negative borrowing requirement in the financial year ended 30 March 1988. In his Budget statement in March this year, my right hon. Friend told the House that he would not budget for a surplus this year, and that, quite rightly, it will be the future policy of Conservative Chancellors –he gave no time limit—that there should not henceforth be a deficit Budget. That policy is long overdue.

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne will recall that the last time a Labour Government balanced the Budget, Lord Jenkins of Hillhead, one of the founders of what used to be known as the Social Democratic party, was Chancellor. In each year from 1974 to 1979, we had a massive borrowing requirement. The Chancellor's decision, which was announced in this year's Budget, that henceforth we should have a surplus is one of the important factors that will have downward pressure on the rate of inflation.

I deplore the speech of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury. He will be corrected by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne. There was another extraordinary contrast and illogicality in the hon. Gentleman's speech. He rebuked my right hon. Friend the Chancellor for allowing an explosion of domestic borrowing, and then criticised the same Chancellor for curtailing public borrowing. That was an extraordinary duality of proposition in consecutive sentences. I shall refer to the serious explosion of domestic credit.

I am certainly one of those who believe that, on balance, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was mistaken to reduce interest rates. I welcome the 2·5 per cent. increase in interest rates in the past six weeks. Now that the Chancellor has wisely decided that there is to be an excess of revenue over expenditure this year—I am sure that he will meet and possibly exceed that target—interest rates are the principal remaining weapon in his hands for keeping downward pressure on inflation.

Interest rates are referred to in the new clause. I am glad to see my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary on the Treasury Bench. If, by the end of this Parliament, we are to abate the evil of inflation still further—I believe that we should—and secure the goal of stable prices, which, after 12 years of Tory Governments, we should secure—that means zero inflation—we must face up to the fact that we must have relatively high interest rates.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: How does the hon. Gentleman square his opinion with that of Dr. Andrew Sentance, the head of the CBI's economic trends policy group? He stated:

"Industry is currently bearing the brunt of the Government's determination to squeeze inflation by raising interest rates."

Does the hon. Gentleman realise that by "bearing the brunt" the head of the economic trends policy group means more job losses and less competitiveness abroad, and that that is a direct consequence of what the hon. Gentleman is advocating?

Mr. Gow: I do not know how you would react to comments from officials of the CBI, Mr. Speaker. I should be anxious if I found myself in agreement with the economic spokesman of the CBI. It comes as no surprise that the CBI is criticising the Government's interest rate policy. There would be greater reason to sympathise with Government critics in the CBI if, in recent years, when we have had high interest rates, industry had performed less well. The truth is that such folk are always whingeing. You do not have the misfortune to listen to them as often as some hon. Members do, Mr. Speaker.

As a result of the policies we have pursued over the past nine years, our determination to abate the evil of inflation has enabled industry to secure the dramatic renewal of its own fortunes, the dramatic increase in output, and improved productivity. It lies very ill on the lips of CBI members to criticise the very Government policies on interest rates that have brought about their companies' renewal.

6.30 pm

Mr. Hanley: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is the failure of CBI members to keep wage increases under control that is one of the greatest contributory factors to the inflation we have today?

Mr. Gow: I have never believed that high wages cause inflation, but I have believed that high wages cause unemployment. Only Governments can cause inflation, and only Governments can cure it.

By another of those strange accidents of events, I have in my hand a copy of a speech made by the noble Lord, Lord Callaghan when he was Prime Minister. The post that he held was First Lord of the Treasury. [Laughter.] My hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) laughs when I remind him that Lord Callaghan was First Lord of the Treasury, but the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne remembers it, because he was at the Treaury at the time.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): That is more than the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) ever was.

Mr. Gow: I was at the Treasury, although not for very long. However, when Opposition Members intervene from a sedentary position, their interventions should at least conform with the truth. I have always had a suspicion about those who wear red shirts, and my suspicion seems to be confirmed.

I commend this quotation to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury, who is now the Opposition spokesman on Treasury matters. I have a copy of this excellent speech also at the side of my bed, along with the famous letter of 15 December 1976.

Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones (Vice-Chamberlain of Her Majesty's Household): To whom was that letter written?

Mr. Gow: My hon. Friend was not in the Chamber when I mentioned earlier that the letter was to Dr. Johannes Witteveen. I shall send a copy to the Vice-Chamberlain.

This speech was made a little earlier, in September. In it, the then Prime Minister commented:

"We used to think that you could spend your way out of a recession, and increase employment by . . . boosting Government spending. I tell you in all candour that that option no longer exists, and that in so far as it ever did exist, it only worked on each occasion since the war by injecting a bigger dose of inflation into the economy, followed by a higher level of unemployment as the next step."

Yet we hear the Opposition spokesman on Treasury matters say that the Government are wrong to eliminate borrowing this year, and that they are wrong to set out as a long-term strategy a commitment to no further borrowing but to the repayment of debt. The hon. Gentleman ought to be pleased that the Government have decided to lighten the burden on our children, upon whom an extra burden had been heaped by the Labour party, because every time that a Government borrows to finance current expenditure, it is the next generation that must repay that borrowing.

Labour party Members claim to be the great moralists. They accuse my right hon. and hon. Friends who sit on the Treasury Bench of being immoral, but the great immorality is for Governments to borrow. The great morality is this Government's commitment to repay debt.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) has a fair selection of bedroom ornaments, and I offer another that he may like to add. I refer to another speech of the now noble Lord, Lord Callaghan. When he was Chancellor of the Exchequer he claimed to have a triple objective, which was to keep inflation down, to keep the balance of payments right, and to improve growth. He omitted reducing unemployment, because that was not a problem at the time. It is a measure of change that one can no longer talk about a triple objective, because reducing unemployment is now also a major objective.

My noble Friend did not achieve his triple objective but it was an honourable one at which to aim. Today, we have a simple objective. It is not difficult to attain, based as it is purely on the level of inflation; all other matters are subordinate to the task of reducing inflation. I am not denying the importance of that objective, but I deny the overwhelming significance we attach to it in a limited manner of operation.

Our balance of payments is now right, not because of any brilliance on behalf of the Government but because of North sea oil. It is not a question of revenue but of the balance of payments. We used to import enormous quantities of oil, which cost us large numbers of dollars. Now we export our oil. That is the major difference, and we ought to be more aware of that than of the more secondary revenue implications.

Growth comes in the wake of balance of payments, because that was the major constraint throughout our entire post-war history. Ever since 1945, stop-go was a question of our balance of payments. It is no measure of the brilliance of the Government's operation of the economy that that constraint is not what it was.

The Government's determination to keep down inflation is admirable, but they have gone a little too far in a number of directions. They have tried to interfere with the exchange rates. The level of the pound, the deutschmark and the dollar, has become of overwhelming importance. All of my hon. Friends, and I suspect many Conservative Members, agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his quarrel with the Prime Minister, believing that he was right and that she was wrong. He was right to take into account the situation that will emerge at the end of this year, when our balance of payments moves into deficit. The Chancellor attempted, quite rightly, to iron out that peak in the deutschmark in particular, even to the extent of not enjoying the beneficial effects upon inflation that the Prime Minister put as the dominant factor.

The right hon. Lady took the easy way out. The easy way out has been chosen by too many Chancellors of the Exchequer facing a level of inflation that was greater than they wanted. They tried to make the pound too strong, and it was industry that suffered. Industry suffers again and again. The Government receives the cheers of the City but the complaints of industry.

The hon. Member for Eastbourne should not diminish too much the views of the CBI. Occasionally, it does talk a little bit of nonsense, but in so far as there is any organisation speaking for industry, it does not do so all the time. It speaks also for other aspects of the economy. In speaking for industry, nobody does it better than the CBI. Chambers of commerce perform that function fairly well, but the CBI is a much more important body. We should not try to diminish its efforts to stand up for manufacturing industry in a way that no other body does.

Mr. Oppenheim: How can the right hon. Gentleman assert that the Government are keeping the pound too strong when the current pound-deutschmark exchange rate is 20 per cent. lower than it was two years ago? It is also about 40 per cent. lower than it was five years ago. Even against the dollar, the pound is about 20 per cent. lower than it was five or six years ago.

Mr. Sheldon: The hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) should not view such matters historically. It is simply a matter of looking at our balance of trade. That is the real test of how well we are exporting the products of our manufacturing industries, and that figure has declined markedly by comparision with imports of manufactured articles. That is the test of industry, and it is the test of employment as well. So we see that there is a need to reduce interest levels, which was a point put so well by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith).

It is the easiest thing in the world to increase interest rates in an attempt to affect inflation, but I do not think that that will have much effect on consumer demand when consumers are paying the rates that my hon. Friend has described. When they are paying between 25 and 35 per cent. APR, the odd 1 per cent. will not make much difference to them. It will, however, have an enormous effect on industry. That is the dilemma: the one can be helped, but only at the expense of the other. In the one case such action will have little effect, and in the other it will cause disproportionate suffering. Once again industry is the major victim of the Government's policies.

The inflation problem does not relate merely to the retail prices index, at somewhere between 4 and 5 per cent. Property inflation must also be taken into account. Statistics do not tell us much about that aspect, but it is enormously important. We have given advantage after advantage to those who, instead of spending their money on productive assets, spend it on the way in which they live in their houses. We have gone too far: the level of mortgage relief is now quite nonsensical.

The tax return on productive assets does not bear comparison with the advantage from adding an extension to a house, trading up and moving into a new one. Buying a productive asset means paying capital gains tax of up to 40 per cent., but nothing need be paid on a home. In the case of inheritance tax, those who trade up will again have the advantage. The abolition of schedule A was nonsense. Buying a productive asset means paying the full tax on the income from it, but no tax need be paid on the advantage of paying no rent on a property.

That absurdity of absurdities, the poll tax, will act as a further ratchet on the value of expensive houses. No one could oppose home ownership, but we can oppose the incredible distortion that results form it. House price inflation is 3 or 4 times the RPI, or even higher. Those who want inflation to fall must level that charge at the Government.

House prices vary too much between the north and the south. House prices in the north, particularly in the past month or two, have increased very rapidly, and I do not regard that as a good development. We are not simply equalising prices in the north and the south; we are letting the disease travel north. Inflation of 4·5 or 4·75 per cent. may be important, but it is not having the devastating effects of the 15, 20 or 25 per cent. inflation in house prices.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Lilley): The right hon. Gentleman said that he thought that the difference between house prices in the south and those in the north was too great, but that he did not want it to be made good by a rise in house prices in the north. Does he advocate engineering a fall in prices in the south?

Mr. Sheldon: That is a very facile question for the Ecomomic Secretary to put. Of course I do not. The result of the increase in house prices is that people are behaving as if they had received large increases in their wealth—which indeed they have—and gaining some comfort from those increases by sitting on them. That causes a distortion of the housing market in this part of the country. I am sure that, in his more reflective moments, the Economic Secretary will not try to defend the increase in house prices. No one would defend it. People say that it is a pity, but that they see no way of doing much about it.

I am not sure that I have the agreement of my Front Bench—one of the pleasures of being a Back Bencher is being able to speak one's mind without considering the consequences too fully—but I believe that we should think about credit control. Of course there is no final answer; instructions to the banks and credit card controls are not permanent. But nothing in this sphere is permanent. It is the Government's ideology that prevents them from even considering the possible solutions.

Financial management is about a number of solutions. That, indeed, is what Budgets are about. They do not aim to set the economy for all time, but seek to deal with problems as they arise. A major problem of our time is the level of house prices and the level of credit, which have gone disgracefully wrong, and the way in which credit for consumers is going ahead much more strongly than credit for industry.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): Apart from advocating the imposition of credit controls—which did not work very well when his party was in government—is the right hon. Gentleman now saying that Labour policy is to abolish mortgage interest relief on owner-occupation, and at the same time to introduce capital gains tax on any profit that an owner-occupier might obtain on selling his house?

Mr. Sheldon: The hon. Gentleman usually listens to me rather more carefully. I distanced myself from the Front Bench from the outset. I have just pointed out that the advantage of speaking from the Back Benches is that one speaks for oneself. Speaking for myself, I should like to see some sort of credit control.

The hon. Gentleman has said that credit controls did not work in the past. I know that they cannot work over a long period, but what they can do is have an immediate and direct impact at the time of their imposition. The impact will weaken and die away thereafter, but such immediate intervention might bring about an improvement in the present position.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): The right hon. Gentleman has talked about house prices. Is it not more symptomatic that demand may be outstripping supply? Ought we not to ease planning controls to allow developers to build more houses?

The right hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends should support the Housing Bill, which will bring on to the housing market many of the 700,000 surplus properties that are being kept empty because of the Rent Acts.

Mr. Sheldon: As for surplus properties, the Public Accounts Committee found that the Ministry of Defence was far worse about hoarding its houses than any local authority, but we had better not go any further into that.

Of course this is a matter of supply and demand—because it is so easy to obtain credit. That is the entire point of what I have been saying. There is of course no final solution, and anyone who thinks that we can legislate and then go away for a year or two is living in cloud-cuckoo-land. But what we can do is produce a temporary effect.

It is a pity that Conservative Members' ideology does not allow them to examine such methods. We could have a better debate if these matters were examined more fully.

Mr. Oppenheim: Judging from the comments made by both Front and Back-Bench Opposition Members, it appears that credit explosions are all right as long as they are in the public sector, but that they are immoral in the private sector. That is a strange contradiction, but goes some way to explaining why earlier this decade, in 1983-84, Opposition Front Bench spokesmen said that we should emulate the public spending policies of the Government of the United States of America, a line which they rapidly dropped when the pigeons came home to roost in America a couple of years ago, when the Americans began to see what we unfortunately found out in the 1970s and what Lord Callaghan found out a little earlier—that one cannot simply spend one's way to economic success or out of recession. Far from it, because that just means inflation and builds a store of problems for the future.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) spoke knowledgeably about Japan. I am sure that he has a lot of first-hand experience of Japan. He mentioned that the Japanese have a high savings ratio. It is also true that, along with their high savings ratio in the private sector, the Japanese have consistently had a low level of public debt and a relatively low level of public spending. The Japanese have had to save a lot of money for their old age because their public and state provision is not very good.

Mr. Chris Smith: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will reflect on the fact that the Japanese are so successful in keeping public spending down because they spend less than 1 per cent. of their GDP on defence.

Mr. Oppenheim: The hon. Gentleman is quite right. The Japanese do spend a small amount on defence because that was the agreement that they made with the American occupying forces in 1952. It might interest the hon. Gentleman to know that the Japanese are moving rapidly to becoming the world's third largest spender on defence because their GNP is far higher than ours. Even forgetting defence spending, and whichever way one looks at it—the fairest way is as a proportion of GNP—Japanese public spending is far lower than ours and has been far lower ever since the war. Indeed, it is far lower than that of almost any other developed country.

By contrast, Britain also had a high private savings ratio in the 1960s and 1970s. In fact, our savings ratio was almost as high as that of Japan. Therefore, it is not wise to try to argue that a high private savings ratio is necessarily the main road to economic success. A savings ratio is part of the story but what we did in the 1960s and 1970s, which was to have high private savings but also high public borrowing and spending, is the way to disaster and is certainly not one of the main planks of Japan's economic success.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Will the hon. Gentleman comment on today's statement by Mr. John Banham, the director general of the Confederation of British Industry, that Britain should now save more and spend less and that the tax cuts in the Budget, especially those given to higher rate taxpayers, were a great mistake in our economic policy because they will lead to much higher consumption and a further lowering of the private savings ratio?

Mr. Oppenheim: I am happy to comment on that. I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman does not realise the nature of the CBI. It is a pressure group, and one main function of pressure groups is to whinge and whine. Throughout this Government's period in office, the CBI has issued statements weekly and monthly which have often opposed the Government's economic policy. Indeed, in inverse proportion to the number of statements that it has issued attacking Government policy, the economy has grown more and more successfully—[HON. MEMBERS: "Is the statement true?"] Mr. Banham may well have made that comment, but I would dispute its veracity or relevance.

It is ludicrous to say that a high private savings ratio is the main plank of any country's economic success. It certainly is not. If the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury wants to to take Japan as an example, I must advise him that Japan's economic success relies on far more complex causes than just its high savings ratio.

Another point which has been missed is that three quarters of the private debt at the moment is debt which is fully secured against housing; it is not debt which is being used primarily to buy imported consumer products. In many ways it is a good thing, as it means that we have an expansion of home ownership. However, I go a little way towards meeting the arguments of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury in that it is at least arguable that too large a proportion of our national wealth is in housing. In some of the more successful economies, a lower proportion of wealth goes into housing. The hon. Gentleman might have had a point if he had cared to make it a little more forcefully.

I should like to turn to the substance of the new clause——

Mr. Gow: There is no substance.

Mr. Oppenheim: Well, my hon. Friend says that there is no substance and that is not a comment on which I would choose to take him to task.

My understanding of the lack of substance of the new clause is that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury would like to introduce a league table of interest rates which would be published monthly. That is a bureaucratic nonsense. My first question is, where will that league table be published? My second question is, how would the hon. Gentleman ensure that all interest rates are published in that league table? Unless he can assure me that every interest rate would be published, I believe that the whole point of the league table would be lost.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned that there were backstreet pedlars of debt with interest rates of up to 4,000 per cent. How can he be absolutely sure that all those backstreet pedlars of debt would be included in the league table? Unless he can assure me that the league table would be completely comprehensive, I believe that it will be a total waste of time.

I noticed with some concern——

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): Why is it important that every interest rate is included in the league, rather than a sample which would give consumers a greater knowledge of or greater desire to find out about the particular rate that they were being asked to pay?

Mr. Oppenheim: Surely, if people want a relatively small sample or a selection of the current interest rates, they can find that in most newspapers, as they currently publish samples weekly. Even the beloved Daily Mirror publishes a sample of interest rates on its weekly money page which it introduced about two years ago. Therefore, a certain amount of selective information is already available to the public.

If the state is to provide a huge league table of national interest rates, it must be comprehensive; otherwise it will not add anything to the information that is already available to the public. Where would the league table be published so that it is accessible to the public, and how will the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury ensure that at least a substantial number of interest rates are available in the list?

I think that I heard the hon. Gentleman trying to induce support for the new clause from the National Consumer Council. I think that I can speak with a little authority when it comes to the views of the National Consumer Council and I can absolutely and categorically assure the hon. Gentleman that, far from supporting the new clause, the National Consumer Council thinks it a total nonsense.

Finally, if the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury had limited his aims to something a little more sensible and attainable, he might have achieved something, but as usual the Opposition have tended to go way over the top in trying to propose something totally unattainable.

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): Will the hon. Gentleman inform us at what meeting the National Consumer Council considered the new clause and pronounced it a total nonsense?

Mr. Oppenheim: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention and can advise him that the chairman of the National Consumer Council personally informed me that she thought the new clause a total waste of time. I hope that that is sufficient authority for the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe) rose——

Mr. Oppenheim: I should like to continue because I am coming to the end of my brief speech—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) should pipe down and listen.

If the Opposition spokesman had concentrated on something that was attainable——

Mr. Morley rose——

Mr. Oppenheim: No, I shall not give way.

If the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury had concentrated on something attainable, he might have gained some sympathy from Conservative Members. He could have concentrated on the fact that when credit card holders get their monthly bill, the only interest rate which legally has to be quoted is the monthly interest rate. No APR, no annualised interest rate and no annual interest rate is quoted on monthly credit card statements. I believe that that is misleading because it gives credit card borrowers a false sense of security. If they see that they are paying 2·5 per cent., 3 per cent. or even 4 per cent. monthly, they do not consider it to be very much. If they saw the true annualised rate, the true APR at anything between 20 per cent. to 50 per cent. plus, they would be far more concerned and far less likely to borrow.

If the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury had limited himself to the sensible objective of trying to persuade the Government to ensure that APRs and annualised interest rates were printed on credit card statements, he would have gained more sympathy from Conservative Members, and possibly achieved some success. I shall make up for the hon. Gentleman's deficiency by proposing to my hon. Friend the Minister that he should consider making it legally incumbent on credit card companies to publish on monthly credit card statements the APR that people are expected to pay, instead of simply the monthly interest rate.

Mr. Worthington: We tabled new clause 3 because we believe that people should be helped to be more aware of the true cost of credit in this country. The figures that were quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) demonstrate the enormous range of interest rates that are charged and that people should be made much more aware of those issues. The Opposition believe that the credit explosion and the increasing amount of debt because of that credit pose a considerable problem.

The Scottish Consumer Council, which decides its affairs in a much more democratic way than the National Consumer Council, where apparently mummy speaks and that is the view, believes that there is a problem with regard to the credit explosion. In March this year it published a study of debt and debt advice in Scotland. Of course, such studies are already out of date because their research extended only to 1986. However, it is worth noting that the Scottish Consumer Council received no co-operation in its investigation from the credit card companies in regard to the level of public accountability which it wanted to show. The Scottish Consumer Council demonstrated that in the past five years the consumer credit taken on by the public had increased by about 50 per cent., and that that increase in credit was much more rapid for bank credit cards, and particularly for in-store credit cards.

Of course, for many people it is not a problem, as my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury said. Credit is essential in our society, and Barclaycard published the fact that something like 40 per cent. of people settle their debts within a month. For those people credit is a form of cheap, interest-free loan. However, 60 per cent. do not do so.

What are the dimensions of the debt problems that people face? Let us consider the issue in regard to housing in Scotland. In 1986, 36 per cent. of those in local authority housing in Scotland were in arrears and 27 per cent. of people in Scottish Special Housing Association dwellings were in rent arrears. In regard to mortgage arrears in the United Kingdom, between 1982 and 1986, the number of those more than 12 months in arrears went up from 6,000 to 11,000. Between 1979 and 1986 those who were between six months and 12 months in arrears on owner-occupied housing went up from 2,500 to more than 20,000—an eightfold increase in seven years. The Scottish Consumer Council calculated that around 20 per cent. of all Scottish households—that is, about 400,000 households—were substantially in debt in terms of housing.

As for Gas Board disconnections, between 1983 and 1987 there was something like a 90 per cent. rise in disconnections, and in 1985-86 around 600,000 British Gas consumers were on repayment plans which were their way of settling their debts. The Association of Scottish Citizens Advice Bureaux reports that, between 1983-84 and 1986-87, the number of inquiries it received relating to clients' debt problems went up from 13,000 to more than 42,000—an increase of more than 300 per cent.

The Scottish Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux considers that the problem of debt is increasing massively. It does not consider that the problem has been caused by the fecklessness and unworthiness of people in debt. It believes that it has a number of causes. Certainly in

[Mr. Worthington]

Strathclyde it is due to the increasing poverty experienced in that area, where about a third of the people are at or around supplementary benefit level. Those figures covered 1986-87 and can only have worsened since the housing benefit changes, the 20 per cent. contribution to rates and the increasing problems of fuel debt.

It is worth pointing out that there are considerable public costs to private credit. Those public costs relate to the work that has to be done by the courts and by social services and housing departments. In Strathclyde, about 70 per cent. of the clients of the social services department are there because of debt-related problems. Even the taking of children into care is related to poverty and debt. Large profits are being made at considerable public cost.

The in-store credit cards are particularly blameworthy. In some cases, there seems to be virtually no check on creditworthiness. Sir Gordon Borrie, of the Office of Fair Trading said:

"A few are giving them away like sweeties."

That is not the usual language in official reports.

I hope that new clause 3 is part of the way in which we can give people a greater awareness of the cost of credit, and that through such lists and other mechanisms people will eventually come to recognise that the way in which we borrow money in this country is simply crazy. It makes very large profits for remote finance houses. Surely we must look for other ways of providing cheaper credit.

It is particularly annoying that, as in all things, the poor pay more. They certainly pay more for credit. I should like to spend a little time encouraging people from all political parties throughout the United Kingdom to look more closely at the contribution that credit unions could make to providing better and cheaper credit. Credit unions manage to advance money at a fraction of the cost to the citizen with a very low rate of credit default—far lower than that achieved by finance houses. It is important to see that the credit union is there to serve the needs of its members rather than to exploit their need for credit. We need networks of credit unions to replace our reliance on finance houses and credit cards, charging the APR that was quoted earlier.

Strangely, credit unions have not thrived in Britain, as they have elsewhere. For example, the first credit union in the United States was formed in 1909 and by 1970 there were 23,400 credit unions in the United States. Some of them are now massive. In 1984 there were 82,000 credit unions in 55 countries with combined debt assets of £402 billion. In Britain in 1984 there were only 72 credit unions, which were mainly small, but they are growing in number. The number has increased considerably in recent years and there are now 73 hon. Members with credit unions in their constituencies.

I am pleased to be talking about this because the region from which I come, Strathclyde, has the greatest concentration of credit unions in the country and the district I represent, Clydebank, has the highest concentration of credit unions within Strathclyde. I know from experience what an enormous contribution they have made to people in my constituency on average and below average incomes in terms of reducing the amount of money that has to be paid to finance houses.

The House—including the Labour movement—has not paid enough attention to cost minimalisation. We have been concerned about the impact of poverty but we have not looked adequately at ways in which to reduce the cost of credit. Credit unions are one way in which we could do that.

My motive for supporting the clause, which is about the publication of lists, is to bring home to people the horrendous cost of credit in this country because of the way in which the financial system operates. By joining credit unions people could obtain that credit at a much lower cost. It is gratifying that organisations such as police forces are increasingly forming their own credit unions and giving credibility to the movement. I hope that people will take note of the desirability of bringing home to people the cost of credit and that they will realise that this is only a step to finding a better way of allowing people on average and below average incomes to borrow more cheaply.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): I have always been interested in the interest rate structure and it is right that any changes should be published. The problem faced by Governments is that they place too much simple faith upon the movement of interest rates. A £5,000 overdraft is a lot of money. However, if people are locked into that overdraft, a 2 per cent. change in interest rates means only an extra £100 a year. However, if industry is locked into the interest rate structure and is involved with sums of £1 million, £2 million, £3 million or £4 million, it has a huge effect upon how it structures its costs.

Governments have too simplistic a faith in the fact that interest rates can control the spending pattern of a country. I do not think they can. It is almost like going back all those years to Adam Smith's day, when, if people were short of money, they ended up being able to afford to buy only bread even though bread cost a huge sum because they could not afford anything else. If people are locked into overdrafts and owing money, in the end all they can afford to do is to pay interest on that money. Governments should not make interest so expensive but should go back to the days when one did something about controlling the way in which money was spent.

In an age such as this, why do people think that they should be able to borrow money cheaply in order to buy a house when house prices are rocketing? Why do people think that they should be able to obtain money to buy a house at a cost lower than they can obtain money to set up a business? It is much more important for people to be able to borrow money and obtain tax concessions in order to set up a business than just to invest in a home when its value goes up. I am a great believer in people owning their own homes. As a man who has been involved in investment all my life, I can say that one of the best investments I ever made has been in my home. Why is it that, because of some ideology we need to give tax concessions on home ownership?

It is splendid to own one's own home, but is it not better to encourage people to invest in growth or in a business? Thanks to one of the most enlightened and progressive Chancellors of recent years—one needs luck as well, and if I had to choose between being lucky or clever, I would always choose being lucky—we are set upon a path of growth, and so-called experts tell us that within the next five or 10 years we will be able to do away with income tax altogether or reduce the national debt. Surely, if we give concessions on interest rates, they should be to people who encourage growth of real resources.

One of the problems about owning homes and putting money into property is that it is basically sterile capital. People ask whether the price of the pound will be affected by controlling interest rates. I do not think that it will. We have to ensure that we encourage the growth of capital in Britain.

We cannot spend money until it has been earned. Some Governments have tried to do that. Some of our friends on the Opposition Front Bench were involved in Governments who thought that they could spend money they had not earned. We cannot do that because it encourages inflation. We should encourage growth. We should encourage people to invest not in property but in a growing business. We need to give people interest rate concessions on putting money into businesses, whether a small shop, a small business or a great business.

We have had to put up interest rates five times—2·5 per cent.—in the past few weeks, but to what avail? It has not stopped people borrowing money in the shops or borrowing money to buy houses. It will discourage people from setting up businesses. I urge the Government——

Mr. Morgan: There is a great deal of thoughtfulness in what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but is he not missing out one factor that tends to make the investment in our home usually the only or best investment that we make? That factor is that it is almost guaranteed to go up in value. In other countries, particularly in the United States, if an area does badly in economic terms, the value of houses will fall by 20 or 30 per cent. In Seattle, for example, that happened during the aviation crisis in the early 1970s; and in Houston, Texas the price of houses dropped by 25 per cent. a couple of years ago. Is he saying that in such circumstances people can make a more rational decision between investment in business and investment in housing?

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: No. I am saying that the reason why property values are rising so much—and the trend is sweeping from London to the midlands and even to the north—is that the country is basically so prosperous. Tax concessions make buying a home one of the best things to do. In Switzerland and Germany more people rent than buy property, but in this country buying a home is a fantastic investment.

I give myself as an example. I live in the midlands and when I got married in 1959 I paid £3,100 for a house that would now change hands at £120,000. Why the hell do I need tax concessions as well? It is better to give tax concessions to people who are building up a business than to people who own their homes.

When we talk about interest rates, we tend to forget that we must encourage growth. Interest rates affect growth considerably. When a person starts to build up a business, he needs to borrow money and that is when concessions and help are needed. They are also needed when people buy their first home, and I am a great believer in giving tax concessions to those people. But why should we give concessions year after year to people who do not need them? It is best to give all tax concessions on interest rates to those who are buying their first home, starting their first business or starting their first venture into life.

The problem is that when one reaches a prosperous stage in life one can sometimes become greedy. Sir Robert Crichton-Brown of British American Tobacco is not content with getting £290,000 a year and share options. He wants to be given £750,000 tax-free as well. The idea of business and enterprise is not merely that people should think that the world owes them something because they have been lucky enough to become a director of a good business and because 29,860 other people happen to work for that company. Becoming the chairman should not be regarded as hitting bingo or winning first prize in the premium bonds.

The idea of capitalism, as I understand it, is that we do not simply say to people that it is easy for everybody. Of course we must encourage people to go in for enterprise, but we must not allow one or two people to foul the nest from which the golden eggs must come. The golden eggs must be laid. What happens at the moment is that people like Sir Robert Crichton-Brown of BAT or Sir John Clark at Plessey think that it is their world. It is not. It is everybody's world. Capitalism will grow if people understand that. I hope that the shareholders of BAT will vote against the extremists—whether on the union side or on the capitalist side. The whole idea of capitalism and prosperity is that things should be done from a moral point of view. It is not moral when people simply help themselves; and if capitalism is not moral, it is nothing.

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): I am rather surprised by the direction that the debate is taking. We have heard some interesting views on interest rates and their effect on the economy, and I hope that we shall hear more on that subject tomorrow, on Third Reading.

New clause 3 embodies a simple proposition, which I think is unanswerable. I am surprised that Conservative Members have resisted the proposal that the Government should publish regularly the real rates of interest pertaining in different sections of our economic life. It is especially surprising that the Government should take that view in an age in which we commonly have to identify the the contents of goods that we trade in, in which advertising codes are required for the pensions provisions of the Financial Services Act and in which there is general demand by the public for more ready access to information.

I find the attitude of Conservative Back Benchers somewhat disingenuous. I do not wish to single out the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) for special mention, but he looked rather shamefaced when he suggested that it was impractical for the Government to publish a list of relevant interest rates. He is a member of a party that would have us believe that consumer choice is everything. I should have thought that the Conservative party would want to give the consumer the maximum information on which to make a choice.

The new clause is not about restricting or even regulating credit card operations, although if my mailbag is in any way typical, there is growing public demand for more strict controls on credit cards. The representations come not just from the Churches but from many business organisations and, most desperately, from people whose lives have been wrecked when the pack of credit cards has fallen.

Borrowing is not unique to a particular class. I know that it is not fashionable to talk about class these days but in the city of Newcastle, people in Gosforth can distinguish between their standard of living and that of people on the

[Mr. Doug Henderson]

Newbiggin Hall estate. All sections of the community are equally likely to borrow. The difference is that when the richest in our community borrow, they are considered to be upstanding: for them, borrowing is laudable, even quite prudent. Anyone on his way up in society has to borrow to get there. It is considered to be a sign of dynamism. In the rich sections of society, it is not even called borrowing. It is called investment.

That is a far cry from what happens to people from the Newbiggin Hall estate in my constituency, who have to borrow. When they go to the DHSS office to ask for money from the social fund to help their family, it is considered slightly shady. That borrowing is regarded as a sign of bad household management, even though it enables families to make ends meet and makes the difference between having some kind of existence and not having an existence at all.

The rich have the advantage of full information. My Gosforth constituents have access to their bank manager, their building society manager, perhaps to a stockbroker on a trip to London on a first-class saver, to the counter staff at Harrods and perhaps, at their golf club, to money managers, who exist even in the city of Newcastle. They know the real cost of borrowing, whether on their Access card, their Visa card or on a credit card for a retail store. They know what they are paying.

The super-rich who consult finance houses or credit brokers know exactly what they are doing. They know the difference between a bank overdraft and a bank loan or any other source of finance. They know the rate of interest and the cost, just as Antonio in "The Merchant of Venice" knew the real cost when he had to borrow from Shylock to help his pal Bassanio with funds for a wedding [Laughter.] I am glad that that amuses my literary Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan). Such people know the real cost and they rarely default on any of their borrowings to finance investments. They rarely have to pay a pound of flesh.

7.30 pm

I ask the Economic Secretary to contrast the information available to the rich—I am not saying that it should not be available—with the information which is available not only to those who are the poorest, such as my constituents at Newbiggin Hall, but to the average citizen who is perhaps a more typical borrower on credit these days. Most people borrow to make ends meet rather than to make a speculative investment, and many have to pay exorbitant interest rates.

Contrary to what the Economic Secretary and Conservative Members may think, my average constituent does not have the information. When he goes to his DHSS office, the person behind the counter is not the chap with whom he played golf the previous Saturday, who gave him advice on how to invest his Giro. When he goes to the local shop, the person who serves him is not someone with whom he has had a Pimms in the club, who has told him of the latest bet in the City on which he should borrow money. When he goes to the Newburn Memorial club on a Friday night for a game of snooker and a pint of scotch —[Interruption.] No half pints, as at the annual beano in Amber Valley—there are not many money brokers to advise him on how to invest his funds and what risks to take. It is little wonder, with the lack of information on credit available to the average citizen, that people are increasingly becoming pawns to their credit cards.

I had better not risk incurring the wrath of Whips and others on this side of the House, so I shall conclude. I do not want always to follow the example of my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) who often encouraged me to speak at length during the Committee stage.

New clause 3 would guarantee that more information was available to consumers. Someone who tries to obtain credit is a consumer in the same way as someone who tries to purchase a commodity. Such information could lead to an increasing awareness of the true cost of borrowing and credit. It could give the less-informed sections of our community a better chance to understand the implications of their borrowing and the risks of investing funds.

Crucially, it could perhaps begin to act against the increasing headache suffered by many individuals and families from the destruction of family life when the pack of credit cards falls. Such people come to Members of Parliament and explain the damage and their anger. If they had known what lay before them, they would not have borrowed in the first place, hard up as they are. It is important that people have such information and consumer choice, and it would be disingenuous of the Government not to accept the new clause.

Mr. Morley: The hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) said that the National Consumer Council was not in favour of new clause 3, but I have a quote from it which states:

> "We recommend the issuing of guidance on prevailing interest rates for different types of loans. These should be widely publicised, so as to provide information for consumers."

That is exactly what the new clause seeks to do.

We need new clause 3 because of the massive growth in credit. About 77 million credit cards are in circulation in the United Kingdom and credit card companies are among the worst offenders on interest rates. It would be a great advantage to consumers to be able to compare the different categories of interest rates, whether for credit cards, hire purchase or other forms of loan. Interest on credit cards has been consistently about 14 per cent. above the average bank rate. Regulations should be introduced to deal with that, but that goes beyond what we can talk about in this debate and I certainly shall not take up time on it now.

There is concern that many consumers are not getting the information that they need to make the best decision on getting value for money from a loan. Too many people are waiting to take consumers for a ride. Credit card companies certainly come into that category—not only bank credit cards but in-store credit cards. We are talking not so much about flexible friends as plastic pirates, considering the interest rates which are charged, particularly in stores.

The question of interest rates goes beyond the United Kingdom. In France, interest rates on credit cards range between 12 per cent. and 18 per cent., in Belgium they range between 18 per cent. and 23 per cent., and even in the home of free enterprise, the United States, credit companies can make a profit charging 14 per cent. interest rates. That is a long way from the level of interest rates charged in the United Kingdom.

The most vulnerable need information most. Those who pay the highest interest rates are often pensioners. A pensioner in my constituency had difficulty paying an electricity bill so took out a short-term loan, the interest rate on which was more than 1,000 per cent. APR. As the law stands that is perfectly legal, but it was certainly nowhere near the best available deal. Even the electricity board, which would have helped, could have offered better terms.

The Government have a responsibility to make this information available to consumers and to assist consumers. They are responsible for adding to the debt problem. They have replaced many one-off payments for those in need with loans. They have pushed up energy prices deliberately as part of a political programme, thus adding to people's burdens. They have pushed up council house rents deliberately as part of their programme. All that has added to the burden of debt on the weakest and most vulnerable people in society.

The new clause tries to tackle some of the consequences of the explosion of debt and easy credit. There is a great need for more regulation. There should be controls on the interest rates that are charged. Clearer information should be printed on credit agreement forms so that people know exactly what they are getting into. There should be easier explanations of what APR means. The NCC survey found that 50 per cent. of people do not understand APR. There should also be restrictions on the peddling of in-store credit cards, which look attractive for short-term weekly repayments but whose APR rates are excessive. The new clause goes some way to giving consumers some rights and protections and the Government should back it to the hilt.

Mr. Lilley: We owe you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and Mr. Speaker a debt of gratitude for allowing us a lose rein in this debate, as a result of which we have been treated to some fascinating contributions.

We heard a vintage performance from my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), who endeavoured to entice us up to his bedroom with a promise that we could see, not his etchings, but certain framed letters from the IMF. There was a serious point behind what he said, and I am sure that all hon. Members took note of it. There has been an enormous change in the nature of the supposed problem that we are discussing today. The last Government were running a deficit of the equivalent of £40 billion a year; this Government are now running a surplus, and all that Opposition Members can do is to try to arouse our concern about borrowing in the private sector.

We also heard a speech that will merit re-reading from my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim). It was interesting not only for the inside information that we were able to garner on the thinking of the chairman of the National Consumer Council but for his interesting proposal to print APRs on credit cards. I shall draw that suggestion to the attention of my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, whose responsibility that is.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) reminded us of the priority that should be given to borrowing by businesses as against borrowing for home ownership. The Government recognise that priority but do not think that the two are mutually exclusive. We want to enable people to borrow for business and for owning their homes. As my hon. Friend will remember, there is unlimited tax relief for an unincorporated business or a partner to borrow for the purposes of his business—that is considerably more beneficial than the terms for homes.

The hon. and literary Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) regaled us with Shakespearean evidence of the need for greater information for the less well-off, but he did not convince many of us that his equally literary constituents would really rush off to buy a supplement to the financial statistics such as that proposed—in effect—by the new clause.

The hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) rightly emphasised the importance of credit unions. I thought he spoiled another part of his case by suggesting that those who ultimately default on loans are somehow enriching those who have lent to them. That is sheer nonsense. There is a mutual interest between those who lend and those who borrow to ensure that the lending and borrowing are not excessive. It is crucial in a free society that both sides to a contract should have an interest in its success, never more so than in lending and borrowing.

I turn now to the strange case put by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). There were two parts to his thesis. First, he maintained that we are suffering from a consumer credit boom; and, secondly, that we have excessive interest rates. The first part of his theory is untrue. About 85 per cent. of personal credit is on mortgages on peoples's residences. We are not ashamed of the fact that considerable sums are borrowed every year by people to buy their homes. As a result of that, about 2,500,000 extra people have been enabled to become home owners since the Government came to power. Consumer credit—the 15 per cent. of personal lending that is purely for consumption—has been growing at a steady, not an accelerating, rate since the beginning of the decade. It is growing less rapidly than lending on mortgages.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury and other hon. Members concentrated on credit card borrowing, as if that were a major aspect of the amount of credit in the economy. But less than 5 per cent. of personal borrowing is accounted for by credit cards, and of that nearly half is credit that does not bear interest because it is repaid within the time specified on the card—[Interruption.] As my hon. Friend says, a small amount is probably borne by those who are paying their Labour party subscriptions on their credit cards.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury said that mortgages were merely a concealed form of consumer borrowing because people siphoned off the money in one way or another to buy consumer goods—although they raised it on a mortgage on the house. He presented no evidence that that was a significant part of mortgage lending and gave no sign of what the Opposition would do to prevent it.

The hon. Gentleman then turned to the second part of his thesis—that interest rates were not, as one might suppose if we were suffering from a credit explosion, too low but too high. I shall give him the opportunity to elaborate on that interesting point.

Mr. Chris Smith: I wanted to take up an earlier point that the Economic Secretary raised about house purchases and mortgages. Can he give the House an absolute and categorical assurance that the reports in Sunday's newspapers that a paper was circulating in the Treasury which proposed a tax on property as a means of controlling house prices were wrong, and that the paper does not exist?

Mr. Lilley: I can give the hon. Gentleman a categorical assurance that he should not believe what he reads in the newspapers. That report has already been denied by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, so it is rather strange that he should repeat it——

Mr. Smith: The statement made by the right hon. Gentleman was that there was no Government proposal, but is there a paper that puts forward such a proposal and is it being considered?

Mr. Lilley: That is a silly point. I have a piece of paper that considers the problem that we are discussing, but I do not see how that is relevant.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury is advancing the bizarre thesis that we simultaneously have an excess of credit and credit that is too expensive. Rather than suggesting that interest rates should rise, as the logic of his case might suggest, he wants to lower interest rates. He quotes back-street lending rates of up to 4,000 per cent. a year, yet appears to deplore the greater competition that we have opened up among the reputable banks and building societies which offer a proper alternative to such shady operators at much more reasonable rates. To the extent that there is a problem of borrowing at excessive rates of interest which people cannot repay, the two answers to it are greater competition and greater information.

Since 1979, the Government have required those advertising credit to show the APR clearly and boldly on the advertisement so that people know the rate of interest that they will be paying. Under this Government, Visa and Access were referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. Those are more positive and concrete acts than any proposed in the Opposition's new clause.

Having persuaded himself that the solution to excessive credit was lowering interest rates, the hon. Gentleman compounded that economic blunder by arguing that we should run not a public sector surplus, but a deficit. He derided my right hon. Friend the Chancellor for the pride that he takes in the fact that we are one of the few major countries able to repay debt rather than incur and burden ourselves with more.

The substantial expansion in home ownership, financed by increased mortgage lending, has come about because the savings of the people are no longer pre-empted by the borrowing of Governments, but are available for industry and home owners to borrow and use productively. We are reaping the benefits of that both in industry and in home ownership.

The hon. Gentleman said that the recent figures analysing the banking loans showed a tentative sign of a recovery in borrowing by manufacturing. He calls a 21 per cent. increase a tentative sign. The growth in borrowing by construction in the past year has been 38 per cent. I do not know what degree of tentativeness he would assign to that.

Mr. Major: Super-tentative.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary suggests super-tentative.

The hon. Gentleman gave us no firm signs of what he would do—not just with the present problems, but with the serious problems that could arise if he had his public sector deficit—to control private credit. He did not venture to repeat the ideas recently stated by his right hon. and learned Friend and boss the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), who, in that great journal of financial discussion and debate Woman's Own, seemed to commit the Labour party to returning to controls on capital and credit. Most people, including readers of Woman's Own, realise that control would be ineffective and unusable in a world without exchange controls, such as we happily have and will continue to have.

Hon. Members might have imagined from the debate that we were discussing a genuine and serious problem that needed a major and substantial solution. The solution proposed is simply that the Government should take powers that would enable them to introduce regulations, and in turn enable them to publish a list of the interest rates available in the market place. Such a list is already available in "Financial Statistics". The effect that it would have on consumers would be negligible. Anyone who proposes such a puny remedy cannot believe that we are suffering from a serious disease. I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to oppose the new clause.

Mr. Chris Smith: The debate on the new clause has been extremely interesting, if only because it has revealed that the hon. Members for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) and for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) wish to launch a savage attack upon the rectitude and wisdom of the Confederation of British Industry. Of course, that organisation is not always right, but it sometimes has a sensible point to make. Whether we like it or not, it is the voice of British industry, and for the two hon. Gentlemen to dismiss it in that way was foolish.

Those hon. Gentlemen also raised an interesting argument about the level of public borrowing, and the Economic Secretary picked it up. However, the hon. Member for Eastbourne gave the game away when I asked him whether he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer was right in 1986 when he forecast a public sector borrowing requirement for that financial year of £4 billion. The hon. Gentleman replied that "it was the right amount for the time." Precisely. Whether a public sector borrowing requirement is or is not necessary, or to what extent the borrowing should be, is entirely dependent on what is right for the time.

For Conservative Members to commit themselves by saying that on all occasions the public sector borrowing requirement should be unnecessary and that a balance or a surplus should always be the aim, is incredibly foolish economically. I am sure that that will not happen even under this Government. The crucial point is that what is necessary and right under the circumstances of the time should be adopted in any Budget. It should not be a case of erecting a totem, as the Government appear to have done.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) made an especially interesting point. He mentioned the adverse impact on industry of rises in interest rates. He asked to what avail was the 2·5 per cent. rise in the base rate in recent weeks. He rightly said that it has not stopped people borrowing money or spending it, but that it has prevented industry from making some of the advances that it might otherwise have made. Using the base rate as the only lever—it is the only lever that the Chancellor has allowed himself to control the expansion of credit—is an imperfect way of dealing with the problem. Other ways to deal with the problem of expanding credit and indebtedness need to be considered.

The Chancellor should be examining temporary credit controls, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) suggested, rather than dismissing them in one sentence as he did in his speech last Thursday, which was widely reported in the press. At the very least, the Government should be adopting measures such as those contained in our new clause.

We are not suggesting that the publication of lists of comparative rates will solve all the problems of the expansion of credit, but at the very least it will give consumers more information about what they are letting themselves in for. That can only be for the benefit of consumers and the overall expansion of credit, because people will be able to make more informed judgments, decisions and choices than they can presently. It is a first step and a small measure, but to dismiss it for the flimsiest of reasons, which are all we have had from the Economic Secretary and Conservative Members, is to throw away what would be a good step forward in the interests of both consumers and the economy. I commend the new clause to the House.

New clause 5

STATUTORY RESERVE

'(1) In computing the profits of the trade of a company to which this section applies for the purposes of Corporation Tax, there shall be allowed as a deduction any amount transferred to a Statutory Reserve following within subsection (3) below.—[Dr. Marek.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The purpose of the new clause is to enable common ownership co-operatives to secure exemption from corporation tax for allocations to a statutory reserve. I emphasise at the outset that the reserve that we are discussing would be non-distributable. That is in line with the basic definition of the purpose of common ownership co-operatives as those in which the assets of the co-operation may not be distributed to members when the co-operative is dissolved or at any other time. The new clause would not, therefore, benefit directly particular groups of individuals. It would not be a tax break whereby members of the co-operative would avoid corporation tax. It would be an incentive to investment in the co-operative and would encourage the growth of that form of enterprise by enabling it to build up its capital more easily than it can at present.

In doing that, we would not give co-operatives any preferential treatment or unfair advantage. On the contrary, we would merely go some way to removing the unjustified handicaps under which workers' co-operatives presently labour. The principal handicap is that co-operatives do not, by their nature, enjoy the corporation tax relief on distribution through what is called the imputation system. For that reason, when that system was introduced in 1972, a special rate was applied to co-operatives, as it was to small firms, and they were therefore put on an equal footing with larger private enterprises.

8.15 pm

The problem is that, while all companies continue to benefit today from the relief on distributed profits, the concessionary rate has not, since the Finance Act 1984, applied to co-operatives and they are therefore effectively penalised by having to pay the full corporation tax rate.

Mr. Hanley: Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House whether the statutory reserve would include a capital redemption reserve or a share premium account?

Mr. Smith: It would certainly not include a share premium account. The purpose is to build up the capital on which the co-operative itself can draw for future investment and, for example, for training purposes.

The co-operatives are further penalised through the obvious reason of being ineligible for the business expansion scheme, which we have debated a great deal in respect of this Bill. The new clause is intended to put them on an equal footing, not to give them any particular advantage, although there are other grounds on which that advantage could be defended and advocated. The argument is based on plain fairness and equity, of which I hope Conservative Members will see the merit.

The new clause is necessary for other reasons. Co-operatives, like other small businesses, especially those attempting to grow quickly, find capital difficult to attract and retain. That applies particularly to co-operatives because they do not have recourse to equity share capital. Moreover, as the law on corporation tax presently stands, workers' co-operatives have, if anything, a perverse incentive to increase wages, rather than to retain profits, to minimise tax liability. The new clause would therefore give a boost to investment, enterprise and growth in workers' co-operatives. Not to support the clause would be to concede that enterprise and initiative are all very well and much to be encouraged, except when they apply to workers in common ownership of their business, as opposed to conventional capitalist institutions.

The extension of the capital base provided by the new clause would also bring substantial knock-on benefits by enabling workers' co-operatives to take advantage of private sources of finance through the improvement in their gearing position brought about by the new clause. It would also address the problem faced by many of those people drawn particularly to the co-operative mode of organisation, who are especially short of funds. The co-operative form of organisation has a particular attraction for unemployed people who have had little or no resources to invest in the business. The clause would therefore be of special benefit to them, as it would be to co-operatives organised by women and ethnic minorities, who almost certainly comprise a larger proportion of the membership of co-operatives than they do of company shareholders.

The new clause would also make a significant contribution to job generation. To date, we in Britain have been talking about relatively small numbers of workers' co-ops, but they have been expanding at an impressive rate. There were 220 new ones last year and we see much evidence of demand for more support for co-ops.

In my constituency I am pleased to see that the Oxfordshire co-operative development agency, in conjunction with a number of other co-operative development agencies across south-east England, has been able, in conjunction with local authorities and the EEC social fund, to put substantial investment into training people in co-operative organisation and enterprise. That has had a quick and good take-up rate and a great deal more of the same could be done were the co-ops in a more advantageous position for raising capital.

If we really want to see just how big is the potential for growth in workers' co-ops, we must look abroad. For example, Italy has more than 15,000 co-ops. In Europe the total number employed in workers' co-ops has been estimated to be about 600,000. The fact that the new clause would bring us into line with Europe is another powerful argument in its support.

There is no doubt that among the many factors that have favoured more widespread growth of co-operatives in Europe has been the more sympathetic tax treatment that they receive and which has counted for a lot. In Italy, workers' co-ops benefit from precisely the form of exemption from undistributed reserves that we are advocating in the new clause. In France they enjoy partial exemption. We heard a good deal in Committee about 1992 and the importance of harmonisation. This is one area in which Opposition Members would welcome harmonisation with the more progressive practices being adopted in other EEC countries.

There are good grounds of equity, enterprise, the benefits of job generation and parity with our European partners for accepting the new clause, enabling worker co-ops to make contributions to an undistributable reserve, free from corporation tax.

The benefits of the co-operative mode of organisation which flow from the involvement and commitment of worker members, of local control, enhanced job satisfaction and a happier working life, are increasingly recognised across the political spectrum.

The new clause is an opportunity for Conservative Members, some of whom have taken a sympathetic interest in this area, to recognise that there are anomalies and that co-operatives are worth encouraging. The Government should at least give an undertaking to examine this area afresh, even if they are not prepared to accept the precise form of the new clause.

The House will be aware that representations have been made in the past not merely from the workers' movement but from the Co-operative Union on behalf of the retail movement, again because of the substantial disadvantages that recent changes in the corporation tax regime have meant for them. Supportive and sympathetic action is long overdue in this area on grounds of equity and fairness as well as because of the benefits of the co-operative mode of organisation that I have already described.

If we in the Labour party had our way, we would be bringing forward a battery of measures to encourage and assist co-operative developments. Instead, all we are asking for tonight is a relatively small and inexpensive change, but one of substantial benefit to a sector of the economy that has not enjoyed the largesse being handed out in other directions. It has more than earned the boost that the new clause would give it.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): I want to say a few words in support of my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith). I am proud to be able to say that Leeds has a long-standing record of support for co-ops, not least because the Industrial Common Ownership Movement is based in Leeds.

[Mr. John Battle]

It is interesting that throughout this century there has been little inward investment in Leeds. Most of the commercial and industrial development has been home grown and home based. That might be why Leeds has developed a strong base of locally grown co-ops.

One of those co-ops, Up-routes Removals Co-operative Ltd., is involved in the transportation industry, again a traditional industry in Leeds. It started on the bridge of the market town, the hub of the Yorkshire textile industry, processing textiles and transporting them throughout Britain, providing a convenient location for communications. It is a worker co-operative providing useful employment for some of my constituents. It is a member the Industrial Common Ownership Movement, the national federation of worker co-ops, based in Leeds.

The Up-routes Removals Co-operative has petitioned me to back a submission on taxation changes to assist the development of worker co-ops, which I am sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Treasury will have received. It made the strong recommendation that "profits which are allocated to a reserve fund in a co-op should not bear Corporation Tax if these monies can never be distributed to members. This relief, available to co-ops in France and Italy"—

as my hon. Friend has said—

"would help us to build up our capital base".

Most people who have had any dealings with co-ops, directly or indirectly, will be aware that raising capital creates a problem since co-operative constitutions do not provide for share capital. Although the worker co-op movement has its own financial institutions, their lending capacity is small.

In 1987, one of the largest of those financial institutions, Industrial Common Ownership Finance, raised £500,000 by way of private contributions to invest in worker co-ops. Obviously that is not sufficient to carry things forward. People who have never been involved in the establishment of co-ops often do not realise exactly what they are up against in establishing themselves and developing.

I remember going to a bank with a small co-op. The bank could not conceive that the co-op had a complex financial and management structure based on the co-operative system. The bank told the co-op to come back as a traditional business, when it might be able to deal with it. The bank was not prepared to accept the principles of the co-operative movement. Thus, the traditional means of raising finance are sometimes closed.

I hope that the Government will accept this relatively non-contentious new clause. In other areas of policy the Government push the co-operative movement as a good thing. Scarcely a week goes by without a Minister suggesting that housing co-ops should be established, and they are part of the same family of the co-operative movement. I hope that the Government will accept the new clause, making it financially possible for co-ops to get on the move. They need practical support and I hope that the Government will enable this sector of the economy to flourish.

This is a small-scale measure, but co-ops can provide help to local economies, particularly where there is long-term structural unemployment in areas with declining industries. The co-ops have a role to play in local economies and I hope that the Government will take this practical step towards enabling them to flourish.

The Paymaster General (Mr. Peter Brooke): May I say in response to the generality of the issue in the new clause that the Government believe that co-operatives are a thoroughly valid form of private enterprise and deserve every encouragement. We also recognise that co-operatives may be a valuable way of achieving the involvement of employees in the affairs of the company in which they work. We believe that measures designed to assist business generally should also be open to co-operatives.

The purpose of new clause 5, to which the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) spoke, is to allow a co-operative that expects to make a substantial investment in the future to obtain tax relief on funds put aside to meet that future expense. The hon. Member for Oxford, East may query that precise wording, but that is a fair description of new clause 5.

8.30 pm

I am not sure whether the hon. Member for Oxford, East made clear what would happen when the future investment was made. However, I assume from the terms of an amendment tabled in Committee, but not selected, that the intention is that the amount invested would be charged to tax. The main effect of the provision would be to allow the co-operative to use the money which would otherwise have been paid in tax. For example, if the money was put aside in year one and invested in year three, the co-operative would have the use of the money for two years. That might reduce its borrowing and interest payments, or the money might be placed on deposit and earn interest.

It is not immediately clear why co-operatives should be favoured in that way. From time to time all businesses may need to accumulate money for future investment and all face the same tax regime. They pay tax on their profits. When they make their investment, they may well qualify for capital allowances. That produces a fair result.

If the law were amended in the way suggested in new clause 5, a co-operative's tax liability would depend on whether it intended to carry out future investment. Such intention may be firm and precise or tentative and vague. It would be extremely difficult for the Inland Revenue to know whether an intention was sufficiently clear that tax relief should be given. The alternative would be to give tax relief without the co-operative having to establish a clear intention to make the investment. That would allow a co-operative, if it was so minded, to use the statutory reserve fund for tax avoidance. I am sure that the hon. Member for Oxford, East would agree that that would be wrong.

More generally, special reliefs of this kind run counter to our business tax policy.

Mr. Battle: The Paymaster General says that reliefs of this kind run counter to Government policy. Would it not be preferable to give a boost to the co-operative movement in the same way that a boost has been given to housing developments for landlords through the business expansion scheme,? It seems that there is a conflict in policy when the business expansion scheme can go ahead under the Budget, but the Paymaster General claims that he cannot give relief to co-operatives.

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Member for Oxford, East mentioned the business expansion scheme, and I intended to respond to that.

Our business tax policy is to remove, or substantially modify, incentive reliefs of this kind, which distort business behaviour and complicate the tax system. The hon. Member for Oxford, East raised a question about the tax imputation system. That system, which in effect means that shareholders receiving dividends do not have to pay income tax at the basic rate, is designed to reduce the double taxation of distributed profits that occurred under the classical system of corporation tax in force until 1972. For retained profits, co-operatives are taxed in the same way as companies, and we believe that that is fair.

In the submissions made to the Government this year, the Industrial Common Ownership Movement suggested that income tax relief should be given to investors who invest money in the loan stock of workers' co-operatives so that such investors are put on a similar footing to those investing in companies under the BES. However, the BES was introduced with the specific aim of helping unquoted trading companies raise new equity, so that, among other things, they need not be overdependent on loan finance. The proposal to allow income tax relief on money loaned to co-ops would run directly contrary to that objective.

I want now to refer to the progress made by the co-operative movement. Section 25 of the Finance Act 1981 provides for tax relief on interest on loans to buy shares in a co-operative. The Co-operative Development Agency, which the Government sponsor, has produced statistics to illustrate the significant growth of worker co-operatives over recent years, to which the hon. Member for Oxford, East referred. It estimates that there were 200 such co-operatives in 1980, and the figure for this year is 2,000. That argues that there has been very satisfactory growth during the 1980s. I salute that progress. However, I cannot commend new clause 5.

Mr. Andrew Smith: I thank the Paymaster General for his recognition that workers' co-operatives are a valid form of enterprise. I also welcome his cognisance of the valuable work and contribution made by those co-operatives. However, I found the right hon. Gentleman's reply wholly unconvincing. It did not support the Government's commitment to co-operatives in principle, which we have welcomed, by any direct action on tax anomalies.

The Government are trapped, and appear to want to be trapped, in a circular argument. They seem to say that because workers' co-ops do not have a conventional capitalist share equity, they cannot benefit from the BES and that the tax imputation system on corporation tax does not apply to them. That means that, because they are co-operatives, they do not have access to the advantages and the assistance which the Government are giving through the BES.

I have said that there is a whole battery of other measures that we would like to implement to encourage co-ops. The thrust of my argument was that such action is necessary merely to place co-operatives on a par and a fair, level playing field with other organisations.

While we will not divide the House on this issue, the House can rest assured that Labour Members will return to this matter in future. We believe that there is strong and growing public support for workers' co-operatives as a means of harnessing people's energy, commitment and enterprise in a way that is fair for all workers as they do not merely leave power in the hands of those who control share capital and the sources of finance. It is liberating being involved in a co-operative. They make a real contribution to the economy and the well-being of the individual. We therefore give a firm undertaking that we will return to this issue.

Question put and negatived.

New Clause 10

TAXATION SERVICES

'(1) Any person who conducts a business which includes the provision of taxation services shall be required to be registered with the Inland Revenue in accordance with Regulations to be drawn up by the Board.

(2) "Taxation services" includes advice and work done in connection with computational matters as well as advice and work in connection with tax mitigation and avoidance and includes the circulation of literature or the placing of advertisements which make any reference to tax savings or tax advantages to be gained from any product or service.

(3) The Regulations shall include the requirement to file with the Inland Revenue and the Library of the House of Commons any literature, brochure, advertisement or other communication of a general nature issued in the course of the conduct of such business.'.—[Dr. Marek.]

Brought up, and read the First Time.

Dr. Marek: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

As a result of the Budget and the Finance Bill, the remaining stages of which we are debating, the top 1 per cent. of the population gained more in income tax than the bottom 70 per cent. That is astounding. Perhaps people in the country at large do not realise that that has happened. If they did, their perception of the Budget's effects, which are not very great, contrary to the Government's expectation in March, would be even lower than it is now.

On average, since 1979, the top 1 per cent. have gained £100,000 in tax cuts, and, as a result of the Budget and the Finance Bill, they will gain another £10,000 each. Yet the average pay and average tax paid by ordinary men and women in the street have risen, because tax, as a proportion of GDP, was lower in 1979 than it is now. It was about 34 per cent. in 1979, and it is now 38 per cent. The average person in the street has not benefited from Tory tax-cutting policies. The Tory party cannot be regarded as a tax-cutting party. It is a taxing party for 90 per cent. of the population, and it is neutral for the remaining 5 per cent. It is a tax-cutting party for the super-rich—the top tax payers and the top income earners.

Our new clause represents an attempt to limit the extra tax avoidance that the super-rich enjoy, on top of all the benefits that the Government have given them in the form of tax cuts and other incentives to avoid paying tax. It is an attempt to limit avoidance by giving the country more information and by making tax advisers register as tax advisers and deposit in the House of Commons Library and with the Inland Revenue all the schemes and advice that is given to extremely wealthy people—the super-rich—so that they can avoid paying tax. Opposition Members are quite sure that if there were knowledge of what goes on in the tax avoidance industry, the country would not put up with such practices, and the Government would be forced to bring in far more tax avoidance measures.

I do not suggest that the Government and the Financial Secretary are not interested in tax avoidance measures. They are. I criticise the Government and the Financial Secretary because their perception of what is and is not allowable is wrong. The line has been drawn too far to one side. We should like to draw it a long way further back towards the middle ground.

[Dr. Marek]

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Budget has dealt a serious blow to the tax avoidance industry and that many people who were involved in that sector of the economy now find themselves almost out of work?

Dr. Marek: If the hon. Gentleman were close enough to me, he would see tears rolling down my cheeks. Perhaps he could give us a few more details about exactly what the Government have done and about what type of tax adviser, rich person or top income tax payer is now out of work. I do not believe that that is the effect of the Budget. If the hon. Gentleman knows something different—this is the Report stage, and we have plenty of time—I shall be delighted to give way to him again so that he may enlighten the House on precisely what he means.

I make it absolutely clear that the Budget has not benefited the super-rich only because of the income tax concessions. It has benefited them because of the capital gains tax concessions also. Only a few of the rich will benefit from the rebasing of the capital gains tax. It is fair to say that the capital gains tax has been increased to 40 per cent. for the small band of very wealthy income-receiving people.

I welcome that, and I am not afraid to say so. By and large, the Government have given real gifts in the form of capital gains tax, because of the rebasing provisions. It is obscene that the richest will benefit from the lowering of the inheritance tax rate from 60 per cent. to 40 per cent. The rate has gone up for those who paid inheritance tax at the rate of 30 per cent., but they are not super-rich, they are perhaps only moderately rich. The Government do not look after them; they look after the super-rich. I wonder whether the country knows exactly what is going on and what advice the tax advice industry is giving to such people.

Mr. Winnick: Is there anything strange in what has occurred? But the Tory party is in politics to look after the interests of the very rich. It always has done so and always will. Once it has a majority in the House of Commons, why should it not look after its friends?

Dr. Marek: One can certainly look after one's friends. We all should look after our friends. We are all on the same planet, and we are all human beings. But the Tory party looks after its friends at the expense of other people who should be its friends. That criticism can be levelled against the Tory party.

8.45 pm

I shall show that, in spite of all the tax cuts and changes in the inheritance tax bands and in capital gains tax, there are still tax avoidance schemes. They are still as plentiful as ever. Although they say that they try to do something about them, the Government still allow them to continue. Tax avoidance schemes provide even more benefits for the rich and the super-rich, on top of all the benefits that they received in the Budget.

Tax evasion—not avoidance—seems to be out of control. There seems to have been a seven fold increase since 1979, yet the Government are not prepared to appoint enough tax collectors and tax inspectors. If they were to do so, the money that they would expend on the training and appointment of such officers would be repaid by the lessening of tax evasion and the extra revenue that the Treasury would receive. The Government do not do that. That is inexplicable, except on the basis that they look after their own friends to the exclusion of everyone else.

The effect of our new clause would be to place tax advice on record in the Library of the House of Commons. It would make the job of the Inland Revenue a little easier. Of necessity, various tax advice institutions, companies and individuals would send all their literature and advice to the Inland Revenue. The public would have a greater awareness. As a result, the Government would be forced to act and bring forward more anti-tax avoidance schemes and measures than they have so far.

In the past nine years, many tax advisers and consultants have done well out of the Government. People have been appointed as consultants left, right and centre. I do not criticise that. There is probably something in it. The Government should know what the poacher is doing. I do not use the gamekeeper-poacher analogy in any disrespectful way. Institutions and people have benefited from the underwriting that has taken place as a result of the Government's privatisation measures. They have reason to thank the Government, but they should not thank the Government for not finding out what advice they give their clients about how to avoid paying taxes. It is the duty of every individual to pay his or her taxes—not more than they must pay, but they should pay a fair amount. If there are loopholes, boltholes and tax havens, the Government should know about them and do

I shall give the House some examples. The first is the business expansion scheme—a clear loophole. Clear abuse is made of that scheme. It represents about £85 million of lost revenue per year. It is used not to create wealth for industry but to plough money into hotels for the homeless. Is that what the scheme was invented for in the first place? If not, the Government should do something about it. The scheme is being used to fund private hospitals and, at the same time, run down the National Health Service. As a result, the National Health Service has become two-tiered.

The scheme is being used also to fund nursing homes and even private schools. A taxpayer with an income of £40,000 should at the top rate pay £16,000, but he can wipe out his liability by funnelling that money into an approved business expansion scheme. If the Government could show that those schemes contribute to industry, to manufacturing production, to wealth creation, or to increasing employment, I would not be saying what I am. However, we believe that those schemes are squalid, shabby tax boltholes that ought to be stopped by the Government at the first opportunity.

The second loophole exploited by the super-rich is enterprise zones. Pop stars, the idle rich and the very wealthy have all been able to set unlimited funds against their tax liabilities by leasing factory units and then renting them out. They are not factory units that they have inspected and which they feel will help to provide wealth in depressed areas or in regions of high unemployment. They have not even seen those factories, but by leasing and then renting out such units, they avoid their tax liabilities.

The resulting forgone tax revenue does not go to depressed areas or to enterprise zones either, because it is siphoned away by the super-rich for their own purposes. Probably, they do not even live in this country. Areas desperately needing investment do not receive it. It now costs about £30,000 to create one job, and the discontinued regional development grants created jobs for a lot less money than that. It is estimated that £60 million per annum is lost in that way.

Our new clause would compel all those who advise pop stars and the idle rich to commit their advice to paper, and then that information would be placed in the Library so that we could all read it. We could then communicate in turn to the public what is happening in the financial life of this country, and I believe that there would be public revulsion at some of the practices that the Government allow.

Executive share option schemes were introduced by the Government in the Finance Bill 1984. About £100 million per annum is lost through such schemes. Some schemes are available to all employees, but the majority of them are designed for executives. They benefit the 50,000 top-paid executives who are able to buy options if the market goes up, as it did. The market can also go down, but in the long term, it usually goes up. Those executives are able to take up their options after three years and then enjoy their capital gains.

Those gains are not achieved through hard work or because of any increased profits, but are the result of the perception of the City and of international capital as to what are the prospects of enjoying a good rate of return from this country in the near future. I do not refer to the long term, because there the time scale is too long. I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will rule me out of order if I dwell too long on that subject, although I may say that the long-term future for this country is not very sound.

Bed-and-breakfasting is another area of activity that the super-rich can use that is not open to the man in the street. The Financial Secretary to the Treasury nods his head—I suppose that the ordinary man in the street can benefit from it, but in practice it is something from which the rich really benefit. If the Government would go some way to meeting the new clause, it would be shown whether it is the ordinary man in the street who exploits bed-and-breakfasting in selling his British Airways shares, or whether it is the rich and the institutions who actually make use of that technique. If the Financial Secretary can tell me who does, I shall be delighted to know.

My final example is that given by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), the shadow Chief Secretary. His question to the Chancellor was answered by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury. My hon. Friend asked:

"if he will estimate the tax liability in respect of the tax year 1988 of a married man aged 51 with no dependent children who is in receipt for that year of a salary from his employer of £1 million"— there are a few such people around—

"assuming he has a mortgage of £30,000, a BES investment of £40,000, an investment of £810,000 in a new enterprise zone unit trust of which 94 per cent. is attributable to building costs and where 50 per cent. of the purchase price is borrowed in circumstances where guaranteed rent receivable equals the interest outgoing, and who makes a contribution to a retirement annuity scheme amounting to £195,000."

That is some form of tax avoidance scheme.

Hon. Members may guess at the answer to the question and how much tax that wealthy person will pay. The Financial Secretary gave a holding answer on 12 April because clearly he had to consult his tax advisers. On 18 April he replied:

"Liability to income tax in 1988-89 would be nil."—[Official Report, 18 May 1988; Vol. 133, c. 503-504.]

That is what our new clause is all about. Tax avoidance measures are being used not by ordinary men and women in the street but by the super-rich, who are so wealthy that the average person cannot dream what type of lives they have and what considerations shape their thoughts during the working day.

The country could do with knowing more about the tax avoidance industry. It is not one that creates wealth for the country but that creates wealth for the idle and the super-rich. Let us have no more headlines of the kind that appeared in the Evening Standard on 12 July—

"The great British tax haven"—

as if that were the sum total and the whole aim of the present Conservative Administration—not a country creating wealth through productive industry, but a tax haven. As to the vain hope that the idle rich will come to this country and pay their taxes here, time will tell who is right about that. Let us have no more headlines of the kind that appeared in The Sun on 16 March:

"Lotsa lovely lolly. Lawson cuts taxes for all."

There is now a sour taste to that tax-cutting, given the 2·5 per cent. hike in interest rates and the fact that for the average person, any tax cut has now been taken away by the increased mortgages that are about to be imposed. Let us have no more headlines such as

"Burton boss"—

I shall not read the next words—

"is £5,000 a week better off".

That is immoral and obscene, and cannot be justified by any Government.

I have here a book that I should like to recommend to the Financial Secretary. It is called "The Rich and the Super-Rich", by Ferdinand Lundberg. I thought that the Financial Secretary would appreciate it. It has an excellent chapter on "The Great Tax Swindle", with sections headed "Tax-free Fortune Building", "How to Get Rich by Not Paying Taxes" and "The Baited Trap"—which explains how to "set up the public for the big tax swindle"——

Mr. Winnick: If my hon. Friend goes on, all Tory Members will want a copy.

9 pm

Dr. Marek: The book is about 20 years old. Things have changed since then.

Another heading is "Valuable Wives". I need not remind the House that, with the disaggregation of income and capital taxation, wives will become valuable to the super-rich. The position has changed for the worse rather than for the better. Other sections are headed "Tax Support for Rich Children", "Other Ways of Income Splitting" and "Additional Tax Dodges", and there are six or seven more sub-headings in the chapter.

The book dwells more on the American than on the British experience, but the introduction is relevant to Britain. Perhaps we could dwell on this story another time. The Government take pride in saying that our present fiscal regime is more like America's than that of any other European country. The second paragraph on page 9 of the book reads as follows:

"Thus the picture is of a society where the rich, despite a well-publicized and apparently stringent tax regime, continue to pre-empt a very large share of society's resources in the United Kingdom, while the poor and the moderately well-off, though relieved of much of the pre-war burden of heavy unemployment"— times have moved on: we cannot say that any longer—

"and with their incomes boosted by the earnings of working wives, have in fact failed to capture any significantly larger share of life's good things for themselves. Certainly there are many more good things; but that is not quite the point. And for the really poor, particularly the old and lonely, the whole equality notion has a pretty sour ring."

The new clause is a small crumb—a small step towards bringing morality back to the governance of our affairs—but I commend it to the House.

Mr. Hanley: Some of us who have been listening to the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) may feel that this is the first time that the new clause has been discussed properly. The hon. Gentleman's diatribe was more an argument against reducing rates of taxation than in explanation of the new clause.

I must declare my interest as the parliamentary adviser to the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales. I have been a chartered accountant for nearly 20 years, and I strongly disagree with the hon. Gentleman. What he is really saying is that it is wrong to be accurate, and wrong to seek advice on the law. The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), who is no longer in the Chamber, shouted from a sedentary position at many points in his hon. Friend's speech. Would he say that it is wrong to seek guidance on immigration law? How about those who give advice on social security benefits? Is it wrong for citizens advice bureaux to give advice? I think it entirely right for the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service, of which the hon. Member for Walsall, North is chairman, to give proper advice on the law as it stands.

Dr. Marek: If the hon. Gentleman reads tomorrow what I said in my speech, he will see that I did not criticise the seeking of advice. But it is the duty of Government to stop tax avoidance when they feel that there are too many loopholes, or that the line has been drawn too far.

Mr. Hanley: If the hon. Gentleman had stayed on that tack throughout his speech, I would have welcomed it. He mentioned briefly that the advantages of forestry had been removed in the last Budget, and I am sure that the Government will remove any other so-called loopholes that are patently immoral. But he has not answered the question whether it is right to give advice on this branch of law. He cast all sorts of aspersions on those who give tax advice, as if to say that giving advice to a person who merely happens to be wealthy is wrong, but it is right to advise those who are not wealthy. That is a strange, twisted argument, which I am not prepared to support.

Every shopkeeper—how many shopkeepers can be genuinely classed as wealthy?—needs and should seek advice on the accuracy of their accounts, and therefore their taxation. All tax advisers—no, all good tax advisers—greatly help the Inland Revenue with the collection of data. If it were not for those who help individuals to calculate an accurate tax assessment, the Inland Revenue would have to spend millions, if not billions, of pounds calculating the correct amount of taxation. I am certain that the Inland Revenue would hate to see the demise of this industry which the hon. Gentleman seems to dislike so much.

I turn to another point about the new clause and to what the hon. Gentleman called his hideous threat to kill off the taxation industry. Let us analyse that threat. The hon. Gentleman suggests that every organisation giving tax advice must send one copy of any generally issued statement of advice to the Inland Revenue and to the Library of the House of Commons.

In my top left-hand pocket I always keep a little card, the same size as a credit card and encapsulated in plastic. It shows the rates of taxation and is issued by Peat Marwick McLintock. If that company is kind enough to send it to me, I think that I should admit its origin. It also states the national insurance contributions for the year, the VAT rates and exemption rates, the rates for corporation tax, for capital gains tax and for inheritance tax and the rates of taxation for company cars. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will admit that those rates increased dramatically in the last Budget.

There is not one word of advice on that card apart from the truth. However, that is exactly the type of "wicked" document which according to the hon. Gentleman pays pounds into the hands of the super-rich and which would have to be filed in the Library of the House of Commons because it is an item which is "issued generally". And yet not one word of specific advice does the hon. Gentleman want to be placed in the Library or sent to the Inland Revenue.

Dr. Marek rose—

Mr. Hanley: I shall give way for the last time because I must be brief.

Dr. Marek: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way but he must get his facts right. What about a person with a company car which happens to be a Rolls-Royce? Under the Budget changes, instead of paying £5·26 a week for the privilege, he will pay £6·01 per week. That is hardly a huge change.

Mr. Hanley: The hon. Gentleman is trying to wriggle out of his embarrassment because I am exposing the truth about the new clause. However, he failed to mention the substantive point that I am making. What he would have filed in the Library of the House of Commons and with the Inland Revenue are items of a general nature that are circulated to the clients of tax advisers, not specific advice. If, as he says those general items are issued in the normal course of business, probably 5,000, 10,000 or perhaps even 20,000 such documents are being circulated. It would not cost a firm of chartered accountants a jot or tittle extra to send an extra two to the Inland Revenue and the Library. That is not a reason for saying,

"Do not vote against the new clause."

Instead, it is an argument for saying that it would not have the effect that the hon. Gentleman believes that it will have of cutting that "immoral industry" like a scythe.

My last point refers to something that the hon. Gentleman did not say about the new clause, perhaps because he has not yet read it. It states that tax advisers must be registered. Whom is the hon. Gentleman serving? If one registers a person calling himself a tax adviser, that person might have no qualifications whatsoever but might then gain credibility from being on the register, as it might be seen as a mark of competence. Plenty of people call themselves tax advisers but are totally unqualified and should not be on any register. The general public should look at the professional qualifications of those who give tax advice.

The register would give those who are unqualified a status that they do not deserve. Those who are listed under section 389 of the Companies Act 1985 or by the Institute of Taxation are properly qualified in tax advice although others may be properly competent. To insist on registration would dupe thousands of people who would read the names on the register as if they were in "Yellow Pages" and turn to those people because the hon. Gentleman will have given them some credibility. The new clause is absolute nonsense. It will not have the effects that the hon. Member for Wrexham claims and it will have disastrous effects on the ordinary man in the street who should look to proper qualifications and not a mere registration.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): New clause 10 is important in so far as it is about professionalism and transparency. I consider that it would have some effect on accountants who are often imprisoned behind duties of confidentiality to their employers about how they might operate.

I want to draw attention to the imprisonment of accountants. By imprisonment, I do not mean imprisonment in prisons, but imprisonment within that duty of confidentiality. Subsection (3) of the new clause states:

"The Regulations shall include the requirement to file with the Inland Revenue and the Library of the House of Commons any literature, brochure, advertisement or other communication of a general nature issued in the course of the conduct of such business."

In so far as it deals with communications, in certain conditions it must include communications from accountants and other organisations within those organisations to their employers.

I wish to draw the attention of the House to a particular communication. I intend neither to state to whom the communication was addressed nor to identify from whom it was sent, but I can say that the document is marked "Private and Confidential". I read it to the House as an example of the problems that exist and which were dealt with by the particular correspondent.

Mr. Hanley: This was not issued generally.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Actually, it was. It was generally issued in so far as it was made available to me and to others at a later stage. It states:

"Dear Mr. X, I understand that you will not be available at our meeting this afternoon. Since it was a fortnight since our last abortive meeting, I feel I must write to you on certain matters whilst there are a number of items outstanding, that is to say, VAT on racehorses, prospectus preparation and computerisation of accounts, the subject that concerns me the most has tax implications.

Some of these practices have been discussed briefly at meetings between ourselves and Mr. Y, and refer to the following: the practice of paying round sum expense allowances that are fixed and have no relation to expenses incurred, and the practice of paying expenses to part-timers in lieu of pay to avoid the wages of the same exceeding national insurance contribution thresholds".

This document is witnessed by a representative of the legal profession. A further letter states:

"I thought I had substantially covered points raised in my memo."

The date is given, but I shall not reveal it.

"However, to reiterate, I have sent to you a draft memo dealing with the matter of expenses. I have provided details of those persons whose salaries are deemed to be paid by separate group companies. Further, I have indicated those whose workload is spread over different group companies, my advice was that wages and salaries should be aggregated for national insurance purposes.

My advice on expenses in lieu of wages, the granting of non-repayable loans and the granting of tax free bonuses was that they be abolished. The only item on which I had to comment was the matter of introducing stand-by allowances in respect of weekend working. I have to advise you that these would be subject to tax.

At our last meeting on the subject some two weeks ago, I asked that in case you did not agree with my advice and that of my colleagues you refer the matter to a suitable firm of accountants i.e. Deloittes for their judgment."

Mr. Hanley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: No. I have no intention of giving way. The letter continues:

"The practice of yourself withdrawing money and having it debited to travel expenses, whilst I appreciate it is against proper business expense, the Inland Revenue may infer differently.

The practice of having emoluments of certain personnel spread over different companies to avoid national insurance contributions, in spite of the fact that they have only one implied contract of employment, and the practice of paying tax free bonuses, and the practice of granting loans and the cancellation therefore without action as to the tax implication. One of the worrying features is the general talk in the office on this matter. Further I believe other people in accounts, and indeed, my predecessors, may have advised you on these matters. You said you would be seeing them within the next"— the period—is identified in the letter.

"Have you had the chance to see them? If not, perhaps I could see them with you. Perhaps it might be helpful if I explain why I have pursued this matter for nearly six weeks. Firstly, you proposed to go public. Whilst you and I might disagree about the time scale, I think it common ground that the necessary investigative accountants will turn over every stone in the organisation. They will, after all, not be responsible to the company but to the public who subscribe for shares. In my opinion, if they encounter a history of tax evasion, they will at least wish to raise provisions against outstanding liabilities. Secondly, the Inland Revenue have stepped up their emphasis on PAYE audit. The likelihood of such an audit of company Y has been increased by the recent television exposure on the Z affair."

9.15 pm

I am not prepared to identify that tonight.

"It is my opinion that in that eventuality the Inland Revenue would have a field day in the face of such blatant and naive tax evasion. The point here is that faced with such a history, it would be far preferable to be legitimate rather than still carrying on in the same vein. This is the point"— the person to whom the letter is sent is then identified—

"I worry about most. We will not, as I have said before, serve your interest best by adapting the existing system or trying to invent other dubious schemes. We must abolish the practices. To do otherwise might prove extremely costly. Thirdly, and lastly, you must appreciate my position. I am a chartered accountant and as such have certain responsibilities. Bluntly, I cannot and will not be party to any illegalities. Whilst in your employment it is my duty to you and to my profession to seek and pursue a return to legitimacy. Time has elapsed since our first conversation and I feel I must respectfully ask you at your earliest convenience for your agreement and proposals to remedy the situation."

Any person who attaches a name to the sender or recipient of that letter may find himself the subject of a legal action. I advise people to be most careful in doing so. I draw this letter to the House's attention because I feel that correspondence of this nature should be brought before Parliament. It is in the public interest that we assess the implications of correspondence of that nature in so far as we have here what is believed to be a reputable company, allegedly, in the view of an accountant, involved in practices that infringe standards that the Inland Revenue and society as a whole expect.

The new clause moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) would deal with matters of that nature. That correspondence might have found itself in the hands of the Inland Revenue at a stage earlier than it subsequently did.

Ms. Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): I would like to say a few words in support of the new clause and the issues raised by my hon. Friends. The new clause contains a useful measure and it is one that the Government could easily incorporate into the Bill. It would ensure that those giving advice in taxation matters did so in a responsible way and were not engaged merely in encouraging different forms of tax evasion and tax avoidance.

The hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) said it was not wrong to give advice. That is true, but the new clause, if accepted, would show us whether particular forms of tax break were being over-encouraged or over-used and would also allow the Government to work out whether the literature sent out was of an acceptable standard.

The hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes mentioned the forestry tax break. If the new clause had been in effect in previous years, the misuse of that forestry tax break would have been spotted much earlier. We would have been able to see how widespread was the advice given to people to go into forestry, thereby ruining large tracts of the countryside, and corrective action would have been taken much earlier.

Mr. Hanley: The Opposition must admit that many chartered accountants send copies of the information that they have issued generally to their clients to the Inland Revenue in support of their advice and of the applications and claims that their clients are making to the Revenue. Accountants are not at all secretive about the advice that they give generally. I disagree with the hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) and her hon. Friends about the new clause because not a single word in the letter that the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) has just read out would be placed in the Library of the House under the terms of the new clause, as the information in it was not issued generally. It was a specific letter and would not be required by the new clause to be lodged in the Library or with the Revenue.

Ms. Quin: I still believe that the new clause would be an extremely useful step. We do not say that it would cure everything, but the hon. Gentleman should consider it along with the other amendments tabled by the Opposition in Committee which, unfortunately, were not accepted by the Government. The Opposition tabled a range of amendments to deal with the problem of tax avoidance. We proposed an obligation for auditors to report tax fraud and that Britain should combine with other countries in the international campaign against tax fraud. Unfortunately, the Government did not accept those amendments. The new clause should be considered as one of a series of measures and not in isolation, although it has to be discussed in isolation on Report.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) pointed out that the problem of tax avoidance has increased during the Government's term of office. That has been shown by the overall amount of money that has been estimated to have been lost to the Exchequer and also in the number of cases that have been brought forward. It is true that the Government have recognised that tax avoidance and tax evasion are problems, but they seem to think that they were problems brought about by high and, as they called them, punitive tax rates. That seems to suggest that top taxpayers are especially dishonest in their rush to engage in tax avoidance schemes, yet although taxes have come down the problem of tax avoidance has not decreased.

We believe strongly that better safeguards and measures are necessary to tackle the problems. If information were given to the Government, to Parliament and to the general public, as the clause proposes, we should be in a better position to decide what further measures were necessary and perhaps a code of practice or new rules might be introduced to deal with the problem more effectively. It is true that that might result in an increase in Inland Revenue staff, but we would welcome that because we believe that staffing levels are hopelessly inadequate to deal with large-scale tax avoidance and tax evasion.

Our proposal might help the Government's image. Their nine years in office and, in particular, the Budget have led them to be seen as friends of the very rich and of tax avoiders. Money saved as a spin-off from such measures would leave more money for the worthwhile social purposes on which the Government have been so reluctant to spend money.

The Government have been generous, indeed wildly over-generous, to the richest, but they certainly have a duty to see that those taxes which are still imposed are properly and duly paid.

Ms. Hilary Armstrong: I support new clause 10, not because it would solve all the problems, but because it would signal to the country that the Government took tax avoidance as seriously as over-claiming benefit at the other end of the scale.

The Government frequently complain that we allege that they do not seem to care about people on benefit. I would make those arguments elsewhere. We can say that with such fervour and it is agreed with such fervour because of the great difference in their language and attitude towards people on benefit and those at the top who try to avoid paying tax.

It has often been said to me that in this debate Back Bench Members seem to refer to their parents. My father often used to say of these matters that so long as something is legal and one can get away with it, it is all right. I do not believe that. Some actions are legal but only because they are contrived to meet legal requirements. In every other sense they involve avoiding one's responsibility to meet commitments to the community by paying taxes which are due.

If an individual goes to his tax adviser and says, "I am not interested in avoiding tax; I wish to pay what I should pay and to ensure that my accounts are straight and that it is clear what I am doing," the adviser will reply, "You must be crazy. There are all sorts of ways in which I can push bits of money here and there so that you do not have to pay large sums in tax." My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) showed that it was still possible for a millionaire to avoid paying any tax by allocating money for particular purposes. Yes, it is strictly legal, but is it right? I do not believe that anyone would want to defend that as right.

The new clause addresses the Government's responsibility to demonstrate their even-handedness and their concern to discourage tax avoidance as much as claiming benefit to which one is not entitled. The Government have a moral problem which is also a political problem. We are not encouraging people to go outside the law. We are saying that it is not right that the law should allow people to avoid their responsibility of contributing to the public purse when they can afford to.

I accept that the new clause may not have the exact effect that we seek. That is because there are tax avoidance experts in this country who will wangle their way around almost any device that the House tries to fashion. The tragedy is that they can advertise in weekly papers with no comeback from the Government. We do not hear the Government saying that it is disgraceful that such people advise individuals and companies on how to get around the letter of the law. No such condemnation is heard.

Acceptance of the new clause, or a commitment by the Government to reword it so that it meets the general point, would be a signal to those companies and individuals that the Government were not prepared to support such skirting around and abuse of the thrust of the law. The Government and, more importantly, the House, should say that. If we are interested in demonstrating that we believe in one nation with equal opportunities for all, without some people seeming to celebrate getting out of their public responsibilities, the House should send a clear message that it does not tolerate and will work against the sort of tax avoidance schemes of which we have heard such good examples this evening.

I hope the Government will think about this seriously. It is a moral and a political issue that is concerned with what is right—not what can be got away with.

9.30 pm

Mr. Morgan: I want to make three brief points, one of which follows on from what my hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong) has said.

The new clause is not an attack on the chartered accountants' profession—anything but. It is a way of trying to ensure that income taxation, which the Government have thought of as a diminishing aspect of taxation—they much prefer value added and other expenditure taxes—should not be seen as a voluntary form of tax. It should be seen by everyone as a means of paying one's dues to society—paying for civilisation, for schools, playing fields and so on. Income tax cannot be voluntary; it must be part of the system in which everyone pays according to his need a proportion of his income, because that is how we finance public expenditure on defence, schools and other things.

In order for the tax not to be seen as a voluntary form of taxation that people can avoid paying, we must not create a society in which people start entertaining that sort of ambition. We must stop the notion that people are mugs to pay income tax. In the past nine years there has been an increasing emphasis on reducing income tax and top rates of tax, as though in some way they drove pop stars abroad and so were destructive of civilisation. The Government have started to create a climate in which taxation, particularly of income, will increasingly be seen as part of the past, with no role to play in the future. And tax advisers play a vital role in that.

When we discussed this subject in Committee, we made great play of the fact that tax advisers and chartered accountants should be happy to remember not only that they are being paid by their clients in a proper manner, but that they have duties to their profession. They have their charter because they are expected to behave in accordance with it, in the same way as doctors and dentists, who hang their framed diplomas in the corners of their waiting rooms, provide a professional skill that has been tested by an appropriate body.

Not all taxation advisers, as the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) said, are qualified, but they have certain obligations, to society as well as to their clients, to ensure that there is fair play between the former and the latter, who do not want to pay more tax than they are due for but who should be advised on methods of paying less than their due. Therefore, we opted for a registration scheme.

In Committee we suggested that, when a case went to court, the Inland Revenue and the courts should be able to look at the working papers. We do not ask for that when a case does not go to court, because we do not want any breach of confidentiality. There were howls of outrage from Conservative Members who worked for professional bodies. They said that that would be completely impossible. Professions such as accountancy have chartered bodies because they are expected to provide a minimum professional standard and because they are part of society, which has given them charters and the status that goes with them. A royal charter shows that a profession is not a cowboy outfit.

We ask for equality of treatment in the way that the Government approach the problems of unemployment and other benefit fraud and of tax fraud. During the Whitsun recess, a major television spectacular about the Department of Health and Social Security showed the sweep that it had organised to catch people making fraudulent benefit claims. We are not in favour of fraudulent benefit claims by people who are working, but do we ever see similar treatment of tax fraud? There is no parity between the way that the Inland Revenue goes about its work of minimising tax evasion and the way that the DHSS officers catch people on building sites. Until there is parity, this will be a divided society. One solution would be the registration of taxation advisers, so that they can both work with the Inland Revenue, as watchdogs on professional clients, and insist that their clients pay their dues to society. Taxation advisers are not there simply to help clients avoid paying their dues to society.

Mr. Henderson: I am grateful for the opportunity to say a few words on the new clause. I thought that I would be saying a few more words, but time does not allow.

The point I want to make emerged more than once in Committee and in the House. The Opposition have challenged capitalism before, and may do so again, but that is not what we are about this evening. We are asking for a bit of honest capitalism. We have already had a debate about full information being made available to ordinary people looking for credit. We are asking here for full information to be made available to potential investors, so that they know where their money is going and the risks that they will be taking. Full information must also be made available to society so that it knows where the Government are providing incentives for investments. We hope that that will be in the interest of all of us. It is really about honesty.

That is borne out by enterprise zones. Those who take a keen interest in the City—I know that some Conservative Members are probably away from the House preparing for their activities in the City tomorrow rather than being with us this evening—will know about the developments in loan finance. Industrialists and corporate organisations no longer rely on direct finance from clearing banks. It is far more usual for them to go to some third or fourth stage removed financial intermediary, which is ultimately laundering money, much of which probably emanated from clearing banks. It is right that people who are giving funds to organisations or who are borrowing from them should know what is happening. That is why the organisations should be registered.

In relation to enterprise zones, I wonder how many people know about the Laser 1988 Trust which services clients of Johnson Fry. No doubt it is a reputable organisation, but most people would not know whether it was reputable or not because it is probably not registered. There have been many reports on enterprise zones. I am sure that the Government are disturbed at the cost of providing a job in an enterprise zone compared with the cost of other measures under section 7 expenditure.

If we want to see sufficient public expenditure, we know that tax subsidies for property investments in enterprise zones are a bad way of using public money and a high cost means of providing jobs. If companies like Laser 1988 Trust which are involved in attracting funds for this purpose had been registered, it might have emerged sooner than seven years after the establishment of enterprise zones that they were not the best way of developing areas that need to be developed or of creating jobs.

Not only investors but everyone would have known that these companies were offering 100 per cent. first-year tax allowances, large investments in London docklands in retail, office and restaurant developments, with a 25-year guarantee of income, regardless of the subletting position, and exciting potential for capital growth. A financial article says:

"Colegrave Johnson Fry Ltd consider that this is the most important opportunity that has been created in tax shelter for many years."

Had that company been registered and had the information about it been made public, we would all have known that it is about tax avoidance schemes and tax shelter and has nothing much to do with the creation of jobs. With the proliferation of such companies, many of which are subsidiaries of investment trusts, we have a new development in the financial world. If we believe in honest and open capitalism, with the maximum information available to the participants, there is a need for new clause 10, which insists on the registration of companies which want to get involved in this business.

Mr. Norman Lamont: There is nothing like the subject of tax avoidance to make the Opposition look more cheerful. We have had subdued debates, with Opposition Members in a subdued mood, but suddenly the smiles have reappeared as we have devoted nearly a full hour to the subject of tax avoidance. The hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) has been able to return to the subject of the super-rich. He has as big a romance with them as Scott Fitzgerald did, but he takes a less benign view of them. However, it enabled him to read from a book, suitably yellow, published 20 years ago, telling people how to avoid tax under the Labour Government who were then in office.

The new clause, if it is to be taken seriously, would serve little purpose. Opposition Members may have wanted simply to air the issue of tax avoidance, which I agree is a serious matter. I want to remind the House of some of the things which we have done to counter tax avoidance. I do not believe that the new clause would achieve anything. The idea that the registration of tax advisers would help the Revenue is wrong. Unfortunately, the Revenue spends much of its time answering telephone calls from tax advisers and knows exactly who they are. We have had to curtail some of the interchange between tax advisers and the Revenue precisely because it is not proper for the Revenue to be involved in discussions such as have taken place in the past, which have amounted virtually to clearance. There is no difficulty for the Revenue in knowing who tax advisers are.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) is right to say that sometimes working papers can shed light on particular problems. He will recall that we have taken some new powers under the Keith committee proposals. In general, the problem is not the hidden nature of the devices used for tax avoidance. After all, unless people intend to behave illegally, they have to make a tax return and show precisely the device that they have used to minimise their tax liability.

9.45 pm

One must distinguish between avoidance, evasion and something in between, which some people call "avoision". Evasion is very much a matter for investigation and prosecution. Avoidance is, of course, legal. It involves exploiting reliefs passed by the House and it is a matter for the House to debate whether it wishes, for example, reliefs on forestry to continue. That will not be helped by registering tax advisers. Then there is the grey area of "avoision". That is a matter of balancing whether reliefs should remain available as a matter of Government policy and deciding whether some schemes are artificial. That sometimes means that the Inland Revenue has to take cases to court. We have had some notable victories. A recent case probably saved about £1 billion of revenue. That is a much more fruitful way of approaching the problem.

I cannot believe that Opposition Members think that the new clause serves any purpose. The Revenue has no difficulty in obtaining knowledge of those people who give tax advice and of their activities. Revenue officials have to deal with those people every day in correspondence over individuals' and companies' tax affairs. The proposals would also be a significant resource cost for the Revenue and would not add to its knowledge of the work involved. There is no difficulty for the Revenue in discovering such information.

The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) read out a letter, which I shall study, although it would not be appropriate to comment on it here. If the hon. Gentleman believes that the law is being broken, he will no doubt reveal the names of the people involved in the matters discussed in the letter, and we shall certainly consider those. However, I am certain that the new clause would not catch the sort of activities—if that is a suitable word—described in that letter. The clause does not require people to deposit in this House or forward to the Inland Revenue working documents or letters to clients. It is a matter of general promotional literature, and that would not be covered by the clause.

I am a little surprised at the attitude taken by Opposition Members. Surely they do not believe that it is necessary to make tax advisers register with the Government to discover that the business expansion scheme, enterprise zones or forestry are being used to reduce tax liability. After all, that has been the Government's policy. The Government have deliberately passed those reliefs because they believe that they serve a purpose.

The hon. Member for Wrexham said that he does not approve of the business expansion scheme. I am sorry to hear that. A couple of years ago, the expansion of the scheme was welcomed by the Leader of the Opposition. It has contributed very much to finance for smaller businesses and has raised additional finance that would not otherwise have been raised.

Furthermore, in this Finance Bill we have targeted the business expansion scheme more specifically on smaller companies. But it is an example of a specific relief being used for a social purpose which we think is in the national interest. We do not need a register of tax advisers to tell us that some people are doing what we have given them a tax incentive to do.

Mr. Battle: Does the Minister agree that the difference in this Budget is that the business expansion scheme has been introduced into the housing market at precisely the time when the Housing Bill has been discussed in Committee without any reference to that fact at all? The Housing Bill seems to make life a lot easier for landlords to exploit tenants as result of the business expansion scheme at public expense and with a tax subsidy.

Mr. Lamont: We shall no doubt be debating the pros and cons of the business expansion scheme tomorrow. However, we do not need a register of financial advisers to discover that the business expansion scheme exists, because we have set it up in the House of Commons.

I note what Opposition Members have said about enterprise zones. They do not like them. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) has made his dislike clear. Without giving away any secrets of some of his colleagues, I can say that that is in sharp contrast to the views of some Opposition Members—they are not all present—who write and ask for enterprise zones to be established in their constituencies because they think that they serve a purpose. They know that employment has more than doubled in areas where enterprise zones have been established.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The reason why some Opposition Members pressed for enterprise zones is simple. It is that we wanted the rate relief. The tax concession was never relevant.

Mr. Lamont: I did not know that the hon. Gentleman was one of those who pressed for an enterprise zone—I was not accusing him—but now we know.

If Opposition Members do not like these reliefs, it must be their policy to abolish them. I assume that they will abolish the business expansion scheme and enterprise zones, which have done some good for some derelict and rundown areas. I also assume from what the hon. Member for Wrexham said about the disaggregation of husband's and wife's incomes, which he seems to regard as avoidance of tax, that they are opposed to that and that the Labour party will end what we propose on disaggregation.

I agree with the hon. Member for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong) that tax avoidance should be taken seriously. If she and other hon. Members had been fair, they would have recognised that the Government have done many things. We have implemented step by step the findings of the Keith committee and given the Inland Revenue greater powers to inquire into the circumstances of individual taxpayers. Moreover, the yield from Inland Revenue investigations has gone up sevenfold while the Government have been in office. The hon. Lady referred to us not putting enough resources into investigations, but she should compare what we have done with what the previous Labour Government did. Over 3,200 people are now carrying out investigations in the Inland Revenue, compared with 1,600 under the previous Labour Government. That is a considerable increase in resources and it has also been responsible for the increased yield.

Mr. Morgan: Does the Minister agree that, despite the increased staff that have been put to work on this matter, and despite the expectations that were announced to the House when successive cuts in top rate tax were made that there would no longer be any incentive for tax evasion, tax evasion has been very much on the increase during the past nine years?

Mr. Lamont: That is pure assertion and the hon. Gentleman has provided no evidence for it. The fact that we have put more civil servants to work and may raise more revenue through their investigations is evidence of nothing except that the investigation has been successful and that this is productive work.

Opposition Members have also ignored the Government's action in successive Budgets to block loopholes. In this Finance Bill we have aligned the rates of capital gains tax and income tax. We have ended the forestry loophole, which they criticised today but did nothing about when they were in office. In previous Budgets we introduced legislation against bond washing and offshore funds. In recent weeks, as new evidence has come to light on matters such as restrictive covenants, and people being paid in gilts, we have announced immediate action against those abuses.

I believe that we have shown through our actions to block loopholes and through the resources that we have devoted to investigations in the Revenue that we take the business of countering tax avoidance very seriously. However, the amendment would do nothing to strengthen the Revenue in this area.

Dr. Marek: We have had a very good debate and I thank all my hon. Friends on the Back Benches for taking part and making a valuable contribution in bringing home to the House and the country the indignation that we feel about the Finance Bill resulting from the Budget and the way in which the money has been divided.

I also thank the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley). He declared his interest. I can reassure him that we have never said that reputable advisers are doing anything dishonest. If the hon. Gentleman reads the Official Report tomorrow morning, he will be reassured on that count. My hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) gave an example of a qualified adviser who had integrity and said so in the letter to which my hon. Friend referred.

I cannot go along with the Financial Secretary to the Treasury in placing all my trust in fighting cases in the courts hoping to recover money which has not been paid in tax, and hoping to win a few cases here and there. The Government should have watertight legislation to make avoidance impossible. It is not right that the Government should go to the courts for that purpose.

These matters are being considered afresh and no doubt the country's top minds are at work generating new tax avoidance schemes. Therefore, I am not claiming that the Government should not go to the courts on occasions, but they must consider alternatives and see what they can do to make the system as simple as possible. They must decide what is genuinely avoidable and what ought not be avoidable. Our argument with the Government is that we believe that they draw the line too far to one side of the argument.

We do not quarrel with the business expansion scheme or enterprise zones. However, we quarrel with their targeting. We do not believe that enterprise zones do the job that they were intended to do. The Department of the Environment has decided not to designate any more enterprise zones. Why is that? It can only be because they do not do the job. Many firms outside the zones have moved into the zones and the net effect is that they are used as a tax bolthole. We object to that.

The business expansion schemes are not being extended except in the property area. Why is that? I suggest that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury is somewhat too complacent in his views about tax evasion. Tax evasion has increased sevenfold over the past seven or eight years and tax avoidance schemes, tax bolthole and tax loopholes are running riot throughout the country. The Government have even said that there should not be more enterprise zones, but the Financial Secretary defended the system tonight. We cannot agree with that.

The new clause is small and will not change everything overnight. Nevertheless, communicating and imparting information can only help. For that reason, I commend the new clause to the House.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New clause 15

TAX EXEMPTION FOR SPORTS ASSOCIATIONS

'(1) Where—

(a) an Association which has as its object the encouragement, development and governance of any sport or other form of recreational activity (or which has as its object the representation of such Associations) is approved for the purposes of this section by the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, and

(b) the memorandum of association or other similar instrument regulating the functions of the Association precludes the direct or indirect payment or transfer to any of its members of any of its income or property by way of dividend, gift, divisions, bonus or otherwise howsoever by way of profit, there shall, on a claim in that behalf to the Board, be allowed in the case of the Association—

(i) exemption from tax in respect of income, and

(iii) exemption from tax in respect of chargeable gains.

(2) In Sections 338 and 339 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, "qualifying donation" shall include a payment under a disposition or covenant made by a company in favour of an Association approved for the purposes of this Section under sub-section (1) above.

(3) The conditions specified in paragraph (b) as sub-section (i) above shall not be deemed not to be complied with in the case of any Association by reason only that the memorandum or other similar instrument regulating its functions does not prevent the payment to its members of reasonable remuneration for goods or facilities supplied, or for services rendered, of reasonable interest for money lent, or of reasonable rent for any premises.

(4) In this section "recreational activity" means any activities in the fields of physical recreation conducive to the health or welfare to those participating in them.'.—[Sir Eldon Griffiths.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Let me start with a few figures. First, the British people each year spend £4·5 billion on sport and sport-related activities, which is rather more than they spend on gas, electricity or bread. Secondly, the Government are fortunate to be able to take out of that sporting expenditure a revenue of £2·2 billion—£770 million in VAT and excise charges, £540 million in betting duty, £950 million in income tax and £100 million in corporation tax. Thirdly, of the total tax take, we return to sport approximately one fifth, £425 million, in rate support to local authorities for their sporting activities and £60 million—a pretty miserable £60 million—for the activities of the Sports Council.

I have two other figures which I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary is panting to hear. The first is that in this country sport employs directly, as salaried people, 367,000 of our fellow citizens, and another 690,000 working one way or another as voluntary helpers, as coaches, referees and administrators. They do that work for nothing: for the love of the game and to help young people.

Those facts demonstrate that the Treasury—God bless it—gets far more out of sport than is given back to sport. I make no complaint about that any more than I do about the fact that road and petrol taxes are not fully paid back in terms of road expenditure. There is a responsibility on all of us to contribute to the general revenue.

10.15 pm

Tonight, I am trying to change the proportions just a little. Consequently, my new clause is designed to even up the balance. Its purpose is to leave to voluntary sports organisations more of the money that they collect—many of them in tin cups, in 10p and 20p pieces—to allow them to save more of the subscriptions from their members and to use that money for what, in effect, are close to charitable causes.

The language of the new clause has been framed carefully to exclude from the tax relief that I am seeking any organisation that is in sport to make a profit. I am in favour of profit, but I do not seek to give tax benefits to those who make a profit. I seek to exclude from that benefit all forms of professional sport, including, incidentally, the Football League, for which in present circumstances I would not lift a little finger.

To qualify for relief under the new clause, a voluntary sport body would need to meet two conditions. First, its object must be "the encouragement, development and governance of sport or . . . recreational activity".

Lest my hon. Friend imagines that in any way I am seeking to help those who regard virtually any form of indoor amusement as something to be tax-relieved, I emphasise that the definition of recreational activity in my new clause means that it must be physical and conducive to the health and welfare of those who take part in it.

The second test that would have to be met—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. I am sure that it would be advantageous to the hon. Gentleman who is moving his new clause if those who are carrying on conversations would do so quietly.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I could not even hear myself, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I could not hear, either.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I am obliged to you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I assure you that you were missing a very good speech.

The second test that would have to be met before the tax relief would be due is that such sporting bodies would need to have articles of association that preclude

"the direct or indirect payment or transfer to any of its members of any of its income or property by way of dividend, gift, divisions, bonus or otherwise howsoever by way of profit".

That makes it clear to those hon. Members who can hear, or to those who want to hear, that only voluntary bodies could possibly benefit.

I turn briefly to the machinery by which eligibility for this tax relief would be determined. At first sporting bodies suggested to me that it should be determined by the Minister. I have been a Minister responsible for sport and I know that it has one of the smallest and perhaps least fortunate trade unions in the world. Therefore, I immediately concluded that on no account should the Minister for sport have anything to do with determining tax relief. Instead, I went for the well-tried route of the Charity Commissioners. I believe that they are perfectly capable of determining whether a sporting body is in every sense entitled to such tax relief because it meets the criteria set out in the new clause.

In conclusion, who are the people that would benefit? I have in my hand a list of hundreds of voluntary bodies throughout the country who give their time and effort for the benefit of sport and to help young people. The anglers, the badminton players, the indoor bowls players, the canoeists, the equestrians and all the rest add up to a very large number of our citizens who, in my judgment, are entitled not to be taxed on the subscriptions that they collect or the donations that are made to help them.

How would they use the tax relief, which I estimate would run to not more than £2 million or £3 million per year at the very best, although I hope that it would increase as donations from the corporate sector increase? They would use it to provide better facilities and better coaches, so that people would be able to enjoy sport and have more to do instead of hanging around on street corners. Their health would improve at the same time. The object is good, the machinery is sound and I believe that my right hon. Friend should look upon the new clause sympathetically.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I rise, briefly, warmly to support my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St.

Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths). He put the case extremely clearly and highlighted how important it is to help sport, because it generates within itself the new facilities and new opportunities that we are all so keen to encourage.

The effort to help sport has been going on for many years. In the 1960s, under a Labour Government, I started trying to produce legislation that would provide mandatory derating of sports grounds for amateur clubs. Ultimately, perhaps 20 years later, that has now come into being. It shows that, with persistence and enthusiasm, sport will win through.

I hope that my right hon. Friend realises that within the House there is tremendous support for sport, for amateur sports clubs and for all the volunteer work within it. I hope that he will look favourably upon the new clause.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): New clause 15 stands in the name of two former Ministers for sport. It has just been supported by yet another, and I understand that it will be supported from the Opposition Front Bench in due course.

Undoubtedly the new clause attracts all-party support. You, Madam Deputy Speaker, had the privilege, if I may so put it, of presiding over a wide-ranging debate on sport last night. You will recall that the right hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who is to reply to the debate, made a fleeting appearance in the debate and, when the issue of tax concessions for sport was raised, felt it necessary for reasons which were never explained to us, to depart and go elsewhere. But that does not detract from the fact that the contribution which is made to sport in our country by voluntary sporting bodies is so substantial that, without it, sport in a form that we know and enjoy simply could not exist.

It seems to me quite unnecessary that voluntary sporting bodies, including, for example, the British Olympic Association, should be compelled to pay corporation tax. If such bodies were exempt, all the sporting bodies in the United Kingdom would put £3·5 million back into sport in Britain—a small amount for the Treasury but an amount that would have a disproportionately large effect on the activities of those bodies which are presently compelled to pay it.

The new clause has all-party support and I hope that the House will be able to support it because in Olympic year it would, above all, provide some justification for the remarks made last night by the Minister responsible for sport. I notice that he is not with us. He said that the Government value sport highly, put a proper premium upon it and are determined to do everything in their power to advance sport and the cause of sportsmen. If the new clause becomes law, it would be more than earnest of those intentions, it would be a reality. It would give a clear and unequivocal signal that sportsmen and women in the United Kingdom could look to the Government for support and assistance.

For those reasons, the House should be happy, indeed eager, to accept the new clause.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): I do not wish to delay the House for more than a few moments because hon. Members wish to talk about short speeches. Perhaps I can set an example.

I wish to put on record the fact that I support my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) because of the case that has been put strongly for a number of years by the British Olympic Association. I agree entirely with what was said by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell). He said that the British Olympic Association should receive all the support it can from the Government and from our country as a whole when our young athletes go to do their best in the various Olympic sports.

As we have been building up to the Olympics the athletes have been preparing themselves. Alongside them, with just as much effort, the members of the British Olympic Association have been raising much-needed funds to allow our athletes to go to the Olympic games. If my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will give us an assurance that the Government will look seriously at what is in the new clause, it will add our flame to the efforts of our athletes in Seoul.

Mr. Henderson: Those of us who have sat through the debates on the Finance (No. 2) Bill for the past two months have become accustomed to contributions from Conservative Members which start vehemently, but become more diluted as the debate moves on; by the time the debate reaches its conclusion, there is not very much left with which to proceed. I am disappointed to detect signs of that in this debate.

I support the new clause, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell) will also give support. However, I do not give my support without reservation and I shall enter a caveat. There is a need for better help for sport in our country. Some professional sport is doing reasonably well; some is not. We should all agree on that. Another point on which we should also agree is that some of our amateur sporting organisations, particularly in sport that attracts support from the poorer sections of our community, have had a difficult time in recent years. I am not making a party political point. We have failed properly to redevelop many of our inner-city areas and our peripheral housing areas. We all know the areas to which I am referring. They can be found in cities up and down Britain.

People who live in those communities and are keen on sport have had a difficult time in recent years because local authorities have had neither the capital nor revenue resources to develop and sustain the development of any assistance to sport, whether it be the involvement of a community worker in a sporting activity at local revenue level or a major capital investment in a new stadium. Because of the difficulties faced by local authorities—as a result of the policies imposed by central Government—those areas and the sports that develop in them have problems.

10.30 pm

Furthermore, because of higher unemployment in those areas, people have less money in their pockets to devote to their sport or to its promotion. My own athletics club, Elswick Harriers, is in the west side of Newcastle—an area of high unemployment and inner-city deprivation in need of assistance from local government, which cannot help it at the moment. Youngsters who depend on the promotion and encouragement of sport are not getting proper opportunities. If part of the £3 million that would be given back to sport if the Government accepted the new clause found its way into areas such as mine, some good would accrue.

[Mr. Henderson]

I must say that I do not think that I could do very much if I had £3 million to spend on sport. Much larger sums are needed to revitalise our sporting world. In many senses, it would be better to give sporting organisations direct funding rather than tax relief but realistically I know that that is not going to happen, and if we cannot have direct funding, I am prepared to settle for tax relief as a second best.

Let me enter my caveat, although I think that the new clause probably accommodates my wishes in this regard. It is not sufficient to say that an organisation will benefit from what is effectively charitable status under the new clause provided that it is a non-profit-making body. That is not a sufficient test. The House of Commons football team could set itself up as an unincorporated organisation whose objects were to give encouragement to football and its promotion and governance in the Palace of Westminster. If the interest from any of its investments appeared in its accounts it might then be entitled to tax relief. The House of Commons football team would be a creditable non-profit-making organisation, but essentially it would be a self-help organisation.

To qualify for the tax relief, an organisation ought to be more than a self-help, non-profit-making organisation. It ought genuinely to act to promote and govern sport in the widest sense and especially to help those who do not have the opportunity to take part in sport at the moment. That would be doing a service—whether to sport in its narrow definition or to recreation generally.

I hope that the Government will recognise the extent of support for the new clause. I urge those who tabled the new clause to proceed with it; I hope that they will listen to what we are saying in that regard. If they do that, the Government will perhaps agree to give about £3 million back to sporting organisations.

Mr. Denis Howell (Birmingham, Small Heath): It is nice to speak from the Opposition Front Bench and to record complete unanimity among all those who have spoken. Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) I hope that we shall not proceed to a Division. In reality, what we need is for Ministers to promise us an effective review of the principles that we have raised. We know that we could not carry the new clause, but it is important that we should sustain the unanimity that we have achieved.

There is every reason for trying to encourage sport and recreation. Wherever we look—in our schools and our cities, in town and country—we see growing social problems. In that context the endeavour of thousands of people in voluntary sport is beyond price and should be encouraged. That is a great social justification for new clause 15. I appreciate the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) tabling it and I support it.

Although I understand what my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North was saying about the need to give grants where appropriate, that is not always the best way. I ask him to reflect on the situation facing the British Olympic Association in 1980. Without going into all the reasons for the difficulties, had we been given grants during the Moscow Olympics, the association would have been in great difficulties because the Government decided to withdraw support. It is better to give permanent assistance, as the new clause suggests, because in a sense that removes the party political problems of the moment.

We should remember Edinburgh's difficulties with the great cost of staging the Commonwealth games, which Sheffield now faces in staging the world student games. It is important to give practical help and every encouragement to such cities which are willing to do that on behalf of the country. Birmingham and Manchester are others.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds has drawn the new clause tightly, for reasons that he explained. I hope that that will encourage the Minister to appreciate that all of us who are determined to encourage voluntary and amateur sport do so responsibly. With this all-party agreement on the record, that should produce a constructive response from the Government.

I remind the House that last time anything like this clause came before the House it was thanks to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) who has persistently and consistently raised these matters. He urged the Government to give help in this direction and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, then the Financial Secretary —I wish his successor on the Front Bench the same success —replied:

> "I accept that there is a problem. Indeed, this was accepted right at the beginning of the introduction of corporation tax. The Select Committee on Corporation Tax recognised that there was a problem and that some way of alleviating it should be sought. But there is a serious difficulty of definition."

That was during debates on the Finance (No. 2) Bill in 1980. The Government have had eight years to look at the definition and it is time that they came up with something, however limited, which all of us would support, to encourage amateur sport.

The then Financial Secretary continued:

> "It is not for the Treasury to define a charity. Still less is it for the Treasury to decide whether a debate should be held on the Goodman report."—[Official Report, 3 June 1980; Vol. 985, c. 1286-87.]

The House will remember that that report paid attention to charities. I have always believed that the Government were one and indivisible. It is for the Government, if not the Treasury, to produce an acceptable definition. I am sure that that is the wish of the House, and, on behalf of the Opposition, I offer our support to the new clause.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Having wandered by mistake into last night's debate on sport, and therefore having heard several speeches tonight that were made last night, I recognise the degree of interest in and feeling about this subject.

I have noted the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths). There are difficulties with the new clause, but I am prepared to review the issues raised in it and to meet hon. Members to discuss it.

All the problems associated with the new clause relate to drawing lines and definitions. Such things are always tedious to people who want their good causes to be advanced, but they are important to those of us who have to put our names to the Bill and the policies in it.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) illustrated the difficulty. He interpreted the new clause as applying to sports clubs. I do not think my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds intended that, but I fear that the clause would apply to clubs. That would have far-reaching consequences. It would be difficult to distinguish a club, as an unincorporated association, from other sorts of unincorporated associations that perform worthwhile activities, such as housing associations that are not run specifically for charitable purposes, certain types of clubs, local enterprise agencies and parent-teacher associations. It would be difficult to exempt one of those without exempting the others. So I cannot go as far as the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North wanted.

I want to say a word about how sporting bodies are taxed. Generally, clubs and associations are liable to corporation tax on income from investments—money in the bank—or from commercial activities such as business sponsorship schemes. That is right. There is a tax deduction for the company, so the money should be taxed in the hand of the recipient organisation. But I am informed that funds raised from members through subscriptions or donations are not generally taxable. That may interest hon. Members.

In general, it has been shown again and again—there have been a number of court cases—that the promotion of sport is not a charitable purpose. Special exemption for charities is not easily available. My hon. Friend's new clause addresses that point. It requires that the qualifying association should be approved by the Charity Commissioners. No doubt that was intended as a way of limiting the problems, but the task would be beyond the powers and experience of the Charity Commission, which is responsible for deciding whether a particular body was established for charitable purposes. The commissioners' decisions are based on charity law and on the principles that have evolved over numerous court cases. Although my hon. Friend has specified the criteria he thinks should be used to determine whether a sporting body is a charity, the provisions of the new clause would not, by themselves, be sufficient for the Charity Commissioners. They would need further guidance. That is a major problem: charity law, which is based on case law, is extremely complicated.

I have just outlined a number of difficulties, but I recognise that there is keen interest in this subject. I shall review it, and I shall be happy to talk to hon. Members about it at their convenience.

10.45 pm

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I am obliged to my right hon. Friend. I agree that there are problems in this matter that have baffled previous Governments. However, the time has now come—this has been demonstrated by the virtual unanimity in the House—for us to do better by our voluntary sporting organisations. It is very much in our interest to do so. I accept immediately my right hon. Friend's invitation to have a discussion about this matter, possibly with right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House who have had the quaint distinction of having been Ministers for sport. I hope that he will allow us to associate with such a discussion those representatives of the voluntary organisations who feel deeply about this matter.

I am grateful to my right hon. Friend, other of my hon. Friends and the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell) for their support.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the new clause.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 21

CLAUSE FOR BAD DEBT RELIEF

Brought up, and read the First time.

'In section 22 of the Value Added Taxes Act 1983 (which allows refunds of tax in cases of bad debts) there shall be added after subsection (1) a new subsection (1A) as follows:

"(1A) In subsection 1 above and regulations under that subsection, references to a "person" shall include any person who has funded the payment of value added tax (the "Payer") on behalf of any person liable (the "Trader") to pay tax on a supply of goods or services; the Payer shall, subject only to subsection (5) below and to regulations under subsection (1), be entitled on making a claim for any bad debt relief to the Commissioners to a refund of tax chargeable by reference to the outstanding amount as if he has been the Trader and to the exclusion of the Trader".'.—[Sir William Clark.]

Sir William Clark: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Someone importing goods into this country has a forwarding agent. In turn, the forwarding agent must pay the VAT on the value of the goods being imported. That is perfectly all right, provided that the goods come in, VAT is paid, and the importer eventually repays the forwarding agent the amount of VAT paid. However, if a forwarding agent pays the VAT and the importer goes into liquidation, the forwarding agent cannot reclaim the VAT.

As my hon. Friend will no doubt tell the House, where a forwarding agent has paid the VAT and the importer or his company goes into liquidation within 30 days, there is a concession whereby the Customs will repay the VAT paid to the forwarding agent.

For the Government to believe that an importer who goes into liquidation will get a bankruptcy or liquidation order against him within 30 days is pie in the sky. It is bound to take a forwarding agent three, four or five months before he can get an order of liquidation or receivership. Consequently, the Inland Revenue's concession of 30 days means nothing.

Where a forwarding agent has paid the VAT on behalf of an importer and the importer goes into liquidation, the Inland Revenue should repay to the forwarding agent the amount of VAT that he has paid on behalf of the importer. Perhaps my clause is not all that well worded, but the spirit of it is that in no circumstances should a forwarding agent be put in the position of paying VAT on behalf of the importer and then, if the importer goes into liquidation of losing that sum paid in VAT. It has nothing to do with the forwarding agent.

According to the VAT regulations it could be that the VAT paid by the forwarding agent could be paid under the registration of the forwarding agent. As I understand it, Customs and Excise do not accept this. There is an anomaly in our VAT regulations, and I hope that my hon. Friend will ensure that the forwarding agent is protected for the amount of money that he has paid on behalf of the importer who goes into liquidation.

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend has explained with admirable lucidity the circumstances in which forwarding agents operate, and how the law bears on them, so I will not repeat that explanation to the House and delay its proceedings. He rightly mentioned that, at the beginning of the month, we introduced an extra-statutory concession that goes some way to meet the problem that he has highlighted. He takes issue with two aspects of that concession—the condition that Customs have imposed for returning VAT to the agent rather than to the importer, and the provision that the delay should be at most one month after the importer goes into liquidation or some similar state of insolvency.

The one-month condition is to ensure that the agent makes best effort to recover the debt, for which he is commercially responsible. It is not our intention that the agent should necessarily force the importer into liquidation. To avoid the position where the agent foresees liquidation and does not press his case, leaving Customs to pick up the bill, the agent generally bills the importer for import VAT for payment immediately or within a short time, such as seven days. He picks up his own and other charges over a longer time. Given the short time within which VAT is normally reimbursed, it is not unreasonable to set a one-month deadline, but I accept that, as my hon. Friend said, liquidation takes longer than a month to achieve. I undertake to look at the working of the time limit in the light of the experience that we have gained with the extra-statutory concession.

I have today announced a general review of bad debt provisions within the VAT system as a whole, not just as it affects importers. Within the context of that general review, we shall look closely at the aspects that my hon. Friend has raised. He has made a powerful case, and that will reinforce the intensity with which we examine the experience of this extra-statutory concession, and we may come round to his view in due course. I am grateful for the way that he has highlighted the issues at stake. We could not accept the new clause as it stands, but we would work within the context of extra-statutory concessions in the first instance.

Sir William Clark: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's assurance. However, I am worried about what happens if, while the Customs and Excise review is going on, a forwarding agent pays VAT for an importer who goes into liquidation. Could my hon. Friend give an assurance that, having accepted the spirit of the new clause—I shall not push it to a Division—from now on, if a forwarding agent has paid VAT on behalf of an importer, and that importer goes into liquidation while the review is going on, Customs and Excise will make repayment of the VAT retrospective from today?

Mr. Lilley: I shall certainly consider the point and write to my hon. Friend about it. I take the point he is making. We have spelt out the specific terms of the extra-statutory concession. Obviously I would not want to change them on the Floor of the House without considering further the point that he has made.

Sir William Clark: In view of that assurance, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 24

REGISTER OF DESIGNATED LAND

'. After subsection (5) of section 31 of the inheritance Tax Act 1984 there shall be inserted the following subsections—

"(6) The Treasury shall prepare, and keep up to date, a register of land designated under subsection 1(b) above.

(7) The register referred to in subsection (6) above shall, in relation to each area of land so designated, contain—

(a) a map on a scale of not less than 1:25,000 showing the boundaries of the land; and

(b) a copy of the undertakings given under subsection (2) above for the maintenance of the land and the preservation of its character, and for securing reasonable access to the public.

(8) The register referred to in subsection (6) above shall be made available for public inspection free of charge at all reasonable hours, and so much of the register shall likewise be made available—

(a) as relates to land in Northern Ireland, at a place in Northern Ireland;

(b) as relates to land in Scotland, at a place in Scotland; and

(c) as relates to land in Wales, at a place in Wales.".—[Dr. Marek.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Dr. Marek: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I think that the best thing for me to do is to read to the House a resolution which was adopted unanimously at the annual general meeting of the national council of the Ramblers' Association on 10 April 1988. The resolution is about inheritance tax and access and it will make the points for the new clause. It says:

"This National Council of the Ramblers' Association remembers that for many years the public were denied unrestricted access to some of the most beautiful parts of the country such parts of the Devonshire Estate in Wharfedale in North Yorkshire including Simons Seat and Barden Moor and Barden Fell. In recollects with pleasure its success in gaining access to those and other areas by virtue of its campaigns. This National Council has noted with concern that although relief against Inheritance Tax has been granted to the owners of the Estate the Association has not been told of any additional access to the estate although Section 31 Inheritance Tax Act 1984 specifically states that the relief is to be granted upon the owner securing reasonable access to the public.

This Council therefore urges both Her Majesty's Government and the Devonshire Estate to make public details of the reasonable access that has been secured. In the event that no reasonable access has been secured (other than that which has been previously secured by Access Agreements or by permissive paths—for the former of which the public already pays and the latter of which can be withdrawn at any time) this Council urges that access be granted immediately.

Furthermore having noted that the Devonshire Estate is not the only landowner that has secured relief from Inheritance Tax it calls upon Her Majesty's Government to publish sufficient details of cases where relief has been granted to enable the public to know what reasonable access has thereby been secured."

There can be no conceivable reason for withholding from the public details of the extra access that has been secured for them in return for concessions under inheritance tax. Surely it must be right for the public to know—by a notice which is displayed or is available at tourist information offices—that there is access to such and such a place at such and such a time. I do not think that confidentiality can arise. Just because the tax details are negotiated between the Inland Revenue and the person who pays the tax, that does not mean that the public should not be told about the extra access. The spirit and meaning of the legislation is that the concession is made for the public. Therefore, the public are entitled to know so that they can make use of the concession. If the public cannot make use of the concession, why should it be made for inheritance tax?

The new clause seeks to make the information available. A noticeboard with times of access would be useful. The Government should provide details of the extra access. I hope that they will not try to justify not doing so because of confidentiality. I do not think they could sustain that argument. I shall be interested to hear what the Minister has to say.

Mr. Brooke: As the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) made clear, the clause seeks to establish a public register of outstanding land that has been the subject of heritage tax reliefs. The register would include details of the undertakings that the owner has given as a condition of receiving the reliefs.

One of the conditions of the reliefs is that there should be reasonable public access to the land. It is right that the public should know that they have that access, but the proposal would go further. It would tell the public why access has been granted—that is, for tax reasons—and that would be wrong.

I wish to deal now with the defence of the principle of Revenue confidentiality, which is important to all taxpayers, although the hon. Member for Wrexham was a little dismissive of it.

11 pm

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Will the Minister explain how people are supposed to know about access at present?

Mr. Brooke: If the hon. Gentleman wishes, I shall speak about publicity arrangements, but I wish first to enter the defence for confidentiality.

It is essential that we should guard against any creeping erosion of our right to keep our private affairs private. The publication of a register indentifying land subject to inheritance tax reliefs would be an unnecessary erosion of the privacy of the taxpayers concerned. The reason for the availability of the land is immaterial. What matters is that the land is there and that the nation has acquired rights to enjoy it and to ensure its proper maintenance. The proposed register would not help to increase those rights, and would involve an unwarranted and pointless breach of confidentiality.

That does not mean that we object to publicity about public access to heritage property. Indeed, requirements about publicity are built into the undertakings mentioned in the clause, but it is right that the publicity should take a form that does not reveal that the access is being given for tax reasons, unless the landlowner wishes to announce that.

Publicity about public access to heritage property which has been conditionally exempted from inheritance tax is incorporated in the terms of the management agreement. The agreement is negotiated to give effect to the undertakings about preservation and public access that are required as a precondition of exemption. Requirements will differ from case to case, but, outstanding chattels apart, for which different arrangements apply, those will normally comprise various proposals.

First, the owner should inform the British Tourist Authority, and the relevant bodies in other parts of the kingdom, of the opening arrangements and subsequent changes. Secondly, the owner should advertise the opening arrangements in one or more suitable publications with national circulation. Thirdly, the owner should display a notice outside the property giving details of the opening arrangements. Fourthly, the owner should agree that the advisory body or bodies, or their agents, which confirmed the property's eligible quality and with whom the terms of the detailed management agreement will have been negotiated, can divulge the access arrangements to anyone who inquires about them. Finally, the owner should agree to such other publicity as the advisory body, or bodies, consider to be appropriate. That could include displaying a notice in some public place in the locality, such as the local post office, library, tourist office or town hall or in a local preservation society's newsletter.

The management agreement would also normally provide scope for additional measures to be agreed, if appropriate, between the owner and the advisory body or bodies at a later stage.

Dr. Marek: Herein lies the conundrum. I accept that tax affairs should be confidential between the Inland Revenue and the person concerned, but, as there is a concession for the public to have greater access, they should have no need to inquire about it. They should be told about it and the information should be publicly available. I should be interested to hear what the Minister says about that. If there is to be greater access, simply as a result of a concession in respect of heritage tax, I do not see how we can avoid saying that there will be greater public access because of inheritance tax. One can leave it at that; one does not need to give any more details.

Mr. Brooke: Let me respond to the hon. Gentleman's preliminary question about whether further publicity arrangements are contemplated.

The machinery for publicising public access is kept under review by the Inland Revenue, in conjuction with other interested Departments and the advisory agencies, with a view to the improvement of publicity without compromising tax confidentiality. The Inland Revenue and the Countryside Commission are considering an arrangement for the commission to respond to queries about public access in particular localities by including details of designated land with land to which public access is available for reasons other than tax exemptions so that a mixture of relevant land would be identified.

The hon. Members for Wrexham and for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) asked whether there was additional access in the event of there already being public access to the land. In many cases there may be reasonable access before inheritance tax exemption is claimed. I think that that was part of the resolution that the hon. Member for Wrexham read out. It is not a prerequisite that more access is always required in return for tax exemption, but the exemption can ensure with more certainty that existing access will be maintained and not reduced at the owner's whim without tax consequences. Therefore, by definition there is a greater assurance that access will be maintained.

The principle of confidentiality governs the Government's reaction to the new clause and I would encourage my hon. Friends to reject it.

Dr. Marek: What is the Government's position where, as a result of the concessions being made, there is an increase in access? Surely the only logical position is to say that the public need to know about that increase in access and, if necessary, people can put together two and two to make four if inheritance tax has just been paid. That is not an intrusion into matters that should be confidential. Has the Paymaster General any view on that point?

Mr. Brooke: In a quite different area of Government activity, I have a responsibility for the forthcoming Government data network, where there is extreme sensitivity about confidential details. All I can say is that once the principle of tax confidentiality of individual taxpayers begins to be eroded, one is on a slippery slope.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I am rather disappointed by the Minister's response. He does not seem to have grasped the problems that so often arise in areas of claimed greater access. Greater access is often not being conferred, but rather there is a reduction in access. In many instances there may have been a right of way or some other custom and practice use of the land; it is at the point that the tax deal is done, and that ceases to be a right of the tax arrangement.

Therefore, what was basically a statutory right, either a public right of way or an unregistered right of way that could have been claimed, is lost to the public. Unless the Government can demonstrate that the public will have a clear statement of what extra access they have, there is little way of judging whether the Inland Revenue or the public have been diddled by the landlord. Something that they had in the past will then be theirs only as a result of a tax concession.

In many areas, the Inland Revenue can simply look at the books and work out whether someone is paying the right amount of money. But it is a complicated and difficult business for someone from the Inland Revenue to check what has been the traditional access to an area, perhaps over the past 30 or 40 years. The only safeguard is to make public what extra access it is claimed is being given. If that is done, the people who usually use that land can turn round and say that that is no concession at all and that a tax concession is being made for no public benefit.

Unless that openness about the extra access takes place, it will be virtually impossible for the Revenue to enforce the matter fairly. In view of the problems that have occurred over access in recent years in many parts of the country where custom and practice access over many years have not been registered as public rights of way and have become permissive access which can be removed at any time, people should be very wary about what is happening. I am very disappointed that the Government are not prepared to go much further.

If the Government are considering ways in which the extra access can be publicised, I hope that they will ensure that the Ordnance Survey is informed of any new footpaths so that they may be shown on maps as rights of way or permissive rights. It should be automatic in the publicity provisions that the Ordnance Survey is notified so that the information appears on maps. The county council should also be notified so that the information may be incorporated on footpath maps and the councils can compare the details with footpath information that they have obtained when preparing definitive maps.

Mr. Brooke: My recollection is that the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) is, like me, a veteran of the Committee stage of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. In that spirit, I will respond to his remarks.

There is a trade-off between the fact that the tax is to be given up and the public's acquisition of rights to a reasonable level of enjoyment of private land. The arrangements are negotiated by the Countryside Commission as advisers to the Revenue. They do not depend in any way on the amount of tax involved. They are either reasonable or they are not. It is for the Countryside Commission alone to ensure on behalf of the nation that the arrangements are reasonable.

The arrangements for monitoring undertakings have been reviewed recently and more systematic procedures have been devised to monitor the owner's performance in fulfilling the responsibilities set out in his undertaking. The undertaking now include a requirement to make an annual report. Where necessary, the Countryside Commission will arrange for a local government body to monitor the landowner's performance of his or her side of the agreement in terms of the maintenance of the land and of public access. There is a genuinely constructive effort on all sides to achieve the access to which hon. Members have rightly attached importance.

Dr. Marek: I thank the Paymaster General for responding to the interventions that have improved the communication between both sides of the House. We have had a better debate as a result. I am also grateful that steps are being taken to improve the position. However, I believe that the Paymaster General has got it wrong.

The Paymaster General's first duty is to the public. A tax concession is given to a particular estate on the condition that the public will have extra access or rights that they did not have before. Those rights must be made available to the public and they must be informed so that they know that those rights exist. If someone wants to keep his tax affairs completely confidential that person or an estate does not have to apply for the tax concession. If he does apply for the concession it should be made clear that one of the effects will be not that the amount of money under consideration will be made known, as the Paymaster General has said, but that there will be extra rights which will be made known publicly.

The Government have got it wrong. The Opposition will not seek to divide the House, but we believe that the Government must do more. Perhaps the Government will have more discussions with the Countryside Commission and other bodies to discover whether a better system can be evolved in future.

Question put and negatived.

New clause 31

PAYMENT OF EXCISE DUTY ON SPIRITS AND WINES

'The Alcoholic Liquor Duties Act 1979 shall be amended by inserting, after section 74, the following section—

"Payments of excise duty on spirits and wines.

74A.—(1) Any duty chargeable on spirits or wines pursuant to section 5, or section 54 above shall be paid, in any year commencing with the year which begins 1st April 1986, fifty-six days after the commencement of the relevant period.

(2) In subsection (1) above 'relevant period' means the period beginning with the date on which the spirits or wines are imported into the United Kingdom or removed from an excise warehouse (as the case may be) and ending on the date on which those spirits or wines are sold to a person otherwise than in the course of an excise licence trade carried on by him.

(3) The powers of the Commissioners to make regulations under this Act or under any other enactment shall be read and construed subject to, and in accordance with, this section".'.—[Mr. Bowen Wells.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

11.15 pm

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I declare an interest as notified to the House in the Register of Members' Interests.

This new clause is not unfamiliar to my colleagues on the Treasury Bench and their officials. Duty deferment has caused serious concern to the industry for many years. In opposition, the Conservative party promised to make right the inequitable situation when it returned to office, and it did so in 1979. True to their word, the Conservative Government introduced the Bill that became the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979. It gave Customs and Excise commissioners powers to make provision for deferred payment of excise duty subject to such conditions or requirements as may be imposed by the regulations or, where the regulations so provide, by the commissioners.

With such powers, one might consider that the new clause is unnecessary. However, it is about five years since the powers were exercised by the Government and the commissioners, when they gave a concession of 28 days of duty deferment. That went some way to offset unfairness and inequity.

The House will know that, in effect, an excise duty is a sales tax. Under the current regulations, those who keep bonds and must pay excise duty—that is, the sales tax that is payable by the eventual customer—actually pay the tax or excise duty direct to the Revenue 28 days after removal of goods from a bond. Before the regulations were introduced, it was payable prior to their removal from bond. Therefore, the Government have accepted the principles about which I am speaking.

On average, excise duties are recouped by bond holders about 12 weeks from the time the goods are removed from bond. The 28-day period does not in any way represent the cost that is incurred by bond holders as a result of the way in which the excise duty is collected at present. Bond holders are not only tax collectors for the Government but Government financiers, because they have to pay the necessary financial charges on the amount of money that is borrowed to pay the excise duty. That is a considerable cost to the industry.

The principle is accepted. In equity, the Government accept that they must meet the case. We suggest that we should halve the difference. That is to say, we should increase the period of deferment from four weeks to eight weeks. That still does not meet the 12-week period that must be financed, but I should have thought that it was a sensible compromise between the two figures. Of course, the cost of that suggestion is zero. It means, though, that, because of the deferment period, in the year in question, using its annual accounting methods, the Treasury must forgo part of the revenue. However, it is collected soon after in the following year. Revenue is forgone in one year.

There is an additional, familiar reason. It is becoming much more important for the Government to reconsider their decision on the matter. I refer to 1992, the advent of the single European market and, therefore, the harmonisation or, at least, the approximation of excise duties and their treatment throughout Europe.

[Mr. Bowen Wells]

In Belgium, spirits have a four-month duty deferment period. In Luxembourg the period is two to six months, in Denmark it is 45 days, in France two months, in West Germany three months and, of course, in our own country only one month. Therefore, to move to two months, as the clause suggests, would simply put us on the same level as that of France, and in considerably worse condition compared with West Germany and other wine and spirit producers. I urge my hon. Friends to look at the matter again to see how they can meet this serious objection from those dealing with bonds and wines and spirits in this country.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Along with my hon. Friends who served with me on the Committee, I am utterly sick of amendments and new clauses of this kind. We had a bellyful in Committee. [HON. MEMBERS: "A skinful."] We would have preferred a skinful, but it was a bellyful that we were given.

The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) has very properly declared his interest, and I am pleased that he did so. I assume that that interest is his position as parliamentary consultant to International Distillers and Vintners Export Ltd. He also declared a consultancy with Geest Industries Ltd., and with the Hawley Group—which I believe is Michael Ashcroft's group of companies. The hon. Gentleman will correct me if I am wrong. When he used the word "we" in moving the new clause, he presumably meant he and International Distillers and Vintners Export Ltd. He may have meant himself and his hon. Friends, but no other names feature on the amendment paper.

If this were an isolated instance, it would be wrong for me to make too much of it. But it is not an isolated instance; it is the latest of a series of such submissions that have been made both here and in Committee. I hope that I will be allowed to set out a little of the background, and explain why we are so annoyed. Before I do so, however, let me say that I shall be asking the Committee of Privileges, on behalf of the Opposition, to draw up new and tighter rules for the declaration of business interests for Finance Bill Committee members and others who wish to make amendments to the Bill. This is not a direct complaint to the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford. It is perhaps his misfortune that this is the point at which I have chosen to make a much broader complaint on behalf of the Opposition.

This is what we have had to put up with. On clause 13, amendments Nos. 30, 60, 61, 50, 51, 53, 41 and 42 were tabled by the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill). The purpose of each was to extend the period in which small businesses must register for VAT: it was a way of easing VAT regulations. On clause 15, the hon. Gentleman tabled amendment No. 11. The purpose of the clause was to put civil penalties on VAT claims. The purpose of the amendment was to give Customs and Excise officers the right to mitigate the penalty—a concession to those who were supposed to make payment of such a penalty.

On clause 48, the hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) aimed to extend the exemption of non-assessability for tax to the entertainment expenses of directors and higher-paid employees—a straightforward concession to what I think my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) would call the super-rich. On clause 51, the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) sought through amendment No. 246 to change the timing of the relief on business expansion scheme moneys subscribed to approved investment funds, the aim being to ease the restrictions on BES funds.

On schedule 6, the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) tabled amendment No. 248, whose purpose was to extend the transitional relief on woodlands associated with farming—a concession sought, I understand, by the Country Landowners Association, which had lobbied forcefully for it. On clause 104, the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter), through amendment No. 344, sought to extend rollover relief to all business assets used in trade. To give the Financial Secretary his due, he said that the amendment could lead to considerable avoidance, and he was certainly right about that. The amendment sought to allow any business asset to extended deferred capital gains tax liability. It would have given rise to considerable tax avoidance opportunities.

When the Committee came to consider schedule 8, amendment No. 353 was moved by the hon. Member for Basingstoke. The schedule was an anti-avoidance measure, which had some support from my right hon. and hon. Friends. The amendment was an attempt to frustrate the closure of a tax loophole. Its purpose was to create a more complex and more effective new tax loophole.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I shall accept interventions when I have completed this part of my speech.

When the Committee reached clause 109, amendment No. 227 was moved by the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West. The amendment sought to ease the regulations on investment trusts, which are vehicles used by the wealthy.

I move on to new clause 13, which was tabled by hon. Members who were not members of the Committee, the hon. Members for Shipley (Sir M. Fox) and for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark). The purpose of the new clause was to remove the ceiling on tax relief for benefits in kind. The argument against the proposition was that it would be the thin end of the wedge for tax relief on private medical insurance, and that is exactly what was intended.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I shall do so at the end of my considerable list.

I move on to new clause 15——

Mr. Butterfill: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: No.

New clause 15 was moved by the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West and supported by the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs). The clause would have extended the time for which a company may set off tax profits against tax losses from the preceding year. That is currently the procedure for the two preceding years. In another words, another tax concession was being sought.

New clause 35 was withdrawn at the insistence of the Opposition——

Mr. Butterfill rose——

Mr. Brown: I shall not give way to Conservative Members while I read out the list. I shall give way to them once I have finished reading it. Surely that is fair.

New clause 35 was withdrawn under duress. It had been tabled by the hon. Members for Wanstead and Woodford, (Mr. Arbuthnot), for Daventry and for Basingstoke. It was a recipe for tax avoidance. It would have exempted gifts or bequests of woodlands from inheritance tax.

Subsection (7) to new clause 28 was moved by the hon. Members for Wyre Forest, for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) and for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe). The purpose of the clause was to give tax relief to companies on moneys used to buy back their own shares to put in a trust to assist employees. The subsection was designed to offer a major tax loophole.

New clause 37 was withdrawn by the hon. Member for Croydon, South. Its purpose was to make easier tax avoidance for a share option scheme by allowing those who have such schemes to sell every year instead of every three years.

New clause 43, which was withdrawn, was moved by the hon. Members for Wanstead and Woodford and for Daventry. Its purpose was to assist those involved in any close company regime. It would have given substantial financial benefit to small family businesses. New clauses 38 and 39, moved by the hon. Member for Basingstoke, would have provided extra inheritance tax relief for holdings of unquoted shares in companies. That is the list.

11.30 pm

It was our concern that companies, and not constituencies, were being represented at this stage of the Finance Bill, and that property, not people, was motivating the hon. Members who moved the new clauses. I make no specific complaint about any individual hon. Member, but that is an extraordinarily long list of vested interests that could not possibly belong to the majority of any of the hon. Members' constituents. They were special interests. The dividing line between a legitimate interest and a less legitimate interest is very fine and we shall be seeking a review of such matters through the Committee of Privileges. In particular we shall be seeking firm guidelines and adherence to them to prevent abuses.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman referred to two of the amendments that I tabled. The first related to investment trusts. The hon. Gentleman suggested, quite erroneously, that I was seeking a tax change in their favour. The amendments were seeking an expansion of the areas in which they might be permitted to invest. Therefore, his assertion is totally wrong and I hope that he will withdraw it.

His second point related to losses. I was seeking to give the same treatment to losses as was available to competitor manufacturers in other western European countries. The hon. Gentleman might have had some sympathy with that. In so far as it related to our international competitiveness it certainly received a great deal of sympathy from many of my constituents.

In discussing the tax changes for which I was asking, the hon. Gentleman significantly failed to mention the changes which I was seeking for the elderly. I seem to remember that the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends voted with me.

Mr. Brown: I studiously avoided mentioning the clause, which was much trailed and got the hon. Gentleman six minutes on the Jimmy Young show, so it cannot have been of no significance. It also got him 35 minutes on the Finance Bill. The topic has aroused considerable interest around the country, and the hon. Gentleman had pursued it for a sustained period. Although some were willing to describe it as nothing but a ramp for Allied Dunbar, that was not the view of the parliamentary Opposition. However, some of the other matters the hon. Gentleman has raised would not fit so easily into that category.

I do not want to be drawn into arguing the merits of each of the clauses. Clearly that would be wrong. However, the parliamentary Opposition have had enough of Parliament and the Finance Bill being used as a vehicle for lobbyists rather than a vehicle for raising legitimate constituency interests.

Sir William Clark rose——

Mr. Brown: I give way to the hon. Gentleman, but I am not nearly as sympathetic to him as I am to the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West.

Sir William Clark: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I am sure that he is not sympathetic to me, but he should get his facts right before he distorts them. He said that I tabled an amendment on share option schemes and then withdrew it. The amendment is still on the Order Paper. It was not selected. I have not withdrawn it, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw the accusation that I have withdrawn the amendment that I tabled relating to share option schemes.

Mr. Brown: I apologise if I said that the amendment was withdrawn and it was not withdrawn. That is not the charge I was making. I was making the charge that it was tabled in the first place. I understand that I may have described new clauses as having been moved when they were proposed but not moved. From our point of view the difference is very fine. We oppose the use of the Finance Bill for raising interests that are not proper interests for Members of Parliament, but involve undue affection for commercial and business interests and not the interests of the constituents whom we were sent here to represent.

Sir William Clark: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. New clauses and amendments are tabled on the Order Paper and it is up to the Chair to make the selection of them. If the hon. Gentleman says that the fact that Conservative Members have tabled clauses which are not selected is a sort of lobby, is that not a reflection on the Chair's selection?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not regard that as a reflection on the Chair's selection. It is a reflection not of the opinion of the Chair, but of the opinion of the hon. Members who table the amendments or new clauses.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I wish to make it clear that I intend no reflection on the Chair, for which I have the greatest admiration.

Mr. Lilley: I do not intend to mix in that argument except to say that I have always assumed that hon. Members, speaking on behalf of whatever cause they choose, are speaking with honour and putting forward views because they believe them and wish to see them upheld. No doubt the hon. Member for Newcastle upon

[Mr. Lilley]

Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) had his reasons for putting forward his list. Those reasons may reflect his interest in the success of his party. That is up to him, but I am sure that he spoke with honour, as all my hon. Friends have done.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) could have justified his moving of the new clause by his generous desire to share his enthusiasm for the beverages with which it deals. I can vouch for that because I have partaken of his hospitality on occasion. He said that the clause is a familiar one, and so it is. It is so familiar that is still retains the date of 1986 from the last time it appeared. That means that were it to be accepted as it stands it would be retroactive, which I do not think is intended.

I recognise that there is a long-standing concern about the matter among those in the wine and spirits business. I recognise too that the whisky industry plays a valuable part in the life of the country, particularly of Scotland, for the employment it provides and for the conviviality it provides here and abroad. It is rather sad that in standing up for the interests of the industry—that is how my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford sees the new clause—which brings employment to many of the constituencies of Opposition Members, they did not thank him rather than criticise him.

I cannot accept my hon. Friend's case because he tries to say simultaneously that the deferment procedures we have at present are costly to the industry and that if we were to grant a longer deferment it would not be costly to the Government. The industry's gain in those circumstances would be the taxpayers' loss. The loss of cash flow in the first instance would be about £245 million in a year, and if we were forced to extend the measure to beer and cider, as might be the case, it would involve a loss of £400 million of cash flow. The interest on that money would be an ongoing loss to the Treasury and should be taken into account.

The importance and contribution of the spirits industry in particular was recognised in the last three Budgets of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor when duties were not raised. In two of the three Budgets, duties were not raised for the wine section of the industry.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford mentioned the approach of 1992 and the possibility of harmonisation of duties and commensurate arrangements proposed by the European Commission. As I have said, those proposals are no more than proposals. We are not alone in having great difficulty with them and I think it extremely unlikely that that package of measures or anything like it will come into force by 1992. There will therefore be no requirement for us to harmonise the related aspects of duty collection as my hon. Friend suggests.

In making comparisons with other countries, it is important to recognise that it is not just duty structures that differ; procedures and commercial practice differ so that in other countries, too, industries may be bearing the cost of tax collection for the same period, or for a longer or shorter period than ours. I hope that my hon. Friend will recognise that we understand the industry's worries about this matter, which my hon. Friend the Chancellor naturally considered fully before his Budget. If my hon. Friend and those in this important industry for whom he speaks, wish to discuss the matter before the next Budget, we shall look forward to the customary representations.

Mr. Wells: It saddens me to hear the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) suggest that my motivation in tabling the new clause was in any way related to self-interest. It would be quite easy for me to avoid the implications of the list that the hon. Gentleman read to the House: one could cite a large number of hon. Members whose constituents are severely affected by the provisions. Many Opposition Members, especially those who represent Scotland, would agree that we need the equalisation of taxation across Europe to move so that the whisky industry—Scotland's primary industry and the biggest exporter from Scotland—is not at a disadvantage compared with producers and exporters of other spirits in Europe.

This is a very serious issue for the whole industry, of which Britain is a leader—and not only domestically. It owns large parts of the liquor and alcohol industries in the United States and parts of Europe. The new clause deals with a serious issue of equity and equalisation, which has serious constituency implications, for many hon. Members. A large number of those who work in the industry in Harlow, which is in the neigbouring constituency, none the less live in my constituency, so if I wanted to I could claim a constituency interest in the matter. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East gave a legitimacy to such an interest, and suggested that that was the only way in which we could raise matters of concern.

The hon. Gentleman can report it to the Privileges Committee if he wishes, but I am certain that my hon. Friends and I will be exonerated from the implications and the smears that he tried to put on us for taking a legitimate interest in a very serious matter affecting the employment of thousands, if not millions of people in this country, which has a very serious effect on our balance of trade and our exports.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman should regard it as a smear when I read out his entry in the Register of Members' Interests.

Mr. Wells: I did not say that that was a smear. I referred to the implication of the hon. Gentleman's remarks. The outrage with which he read the list suggested that there was something dishonourable in taking up these matters even if one has a declared interest and has brought it to the attention of the House. If his dictum were accepted, none of us would be able to raise legitimate issues. Opposition Members would be in no position to raise in the House matters to do with trade unions or their interests. The House would be a great deal poorer if hon. Members could not bring their deep knowledge of particular interests to its attention.

I am sure that the House does not wish to be delayed further on this matter. I did not intend to prolong the debate. I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for answering my propositions sympathetically. The argument that we do not have to harmonise excise duties because of 1992 does not abort the argument that the spirits and wine industry should be able to trade on the same basis as that of its competitors overseas, particularly those within the EEC. Therefore, my argument has some serious validity and I am grateful to him for saying that he will consider with deep seriousness the inequity involved. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 3

HYDROCARBON OIL

11.45 pm

Mr. Colvin: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 2, line 31, at end insert—

'and at the end there shall be inserted "but there shall be no duty of excise on aviation gasoline fuel, as defined in section 11(2)(a) below",'.

The amendment would wholly abolish the excise duty on aviation gasoline, or avgas.

After all that has been said about hon. Members declaring their interests I must say that although on my curriculum vitae I am listed as a qualified pilot, as a Member of Parliament I have neither the time nor the money to maintain the validity of my licence; more's the pity. In reply to what the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) said about tax avoidance, the rate at which the Government are cutting rates of tax will soon mean that the tax avoidance business will be out of business. Perhaps next year his list will be a great deal shorter.

Avgas fuel is used in piston-engined aircraft and bears duty of 46·5p per gallon plus VAT, whereas aviation kerosene, which is used in the more expensive turbo-prop and jet engines and which is called avtur, carries no duty. The amendment would remove this gross injustice. We hoped that the Government would remove the injustice in 1982. On that occasion, having won the argument, we gained only a 50 per cent. reduction in the duty. This amendment gives the Government the opportunity to complete the welcome reform which they began then.

I have heard it said within the Treasury that avgas is mostly used for private and pleasure flying and avtur for business and commercial flying, so the so-called wealthy private pilots who can afford to fly for pleasure may just as well pay duty on that fuel. That is based on a false premise. If the Treasury still uses that argument, one must question the validity of any other reasons that it puts forward for resisting the amendment.

Any analysis will show that the vast majority of passengers flying commercial airlines do so for recreation and pleasure, not business, while most of the fuel used by general aviation, that is the smaller aircraft, is for business purposes. The breakdown of general aviation and flying shows that 63 per cent. is air taxi operators, corporate and third-level passenger operations, 25 per cent. is flying training for professional and private ratings, 10 per cent. is agricultural flying and aerial work, and just over 2 per cent. is pure sport and recreation.

The general aviation training role is particularly important. Between 1975 and 1986, little sponsored training for civil aviation took place in the United Kingdom because the airlines did not need the additional pilots. Now, with civil aviation booming, the airline industry is grabbing every available pilot and there is a serious shortage of air taxi pilots and flying instructors, which must be made up. Without the pool of private pilots to draw upon, I reckon that commercial civil aviation would probably collapse.

This demand is worldwide. Because of the extra burden of avgas duty and the resulting higher costs which our flying schools have to bear, the training of overseas pilots in Britain has almost stopped. That means a loss of invisible earnings of about £25,000 per head, a total running into tens of millions of pounds of lost foreign revenue for Britain.

The Government suggested that if the duty on avgas was abolished the fuel would be used in motor cars. Not only would avgas with no duty still be up to 16p more expensive than ordinary motor fuel, but it would do the engines of motor cars no good. Because of its special chemical characteristics, it is not suitable for cars. In any case, the distribution of avgas is strictly controlled by a few organisations and it is delivered only to our 60 or so airfields. Also, because the amount of avgas used in proportion to motor fuel and avtur is tiny, its consumption can easily be monitored, it can be dyed like farm diesel and spot checks can be carried out on its use.

It is good that the Government are interested in saving administrative costs. The Customs and Excise are certainly no exception. A pilot flying an avgas-fuelled aircraft can claim back his duty paid before departing on an international flight. A lot of bureaucracy and red tape are involved in completing and verifying all the documents, counter-checking claims and issuing cheques for payments. Abolishing the duty will abolish all this cumbersome bureaucracy.

What would this cost? In a full tax year, the loss to the Revenue of completely abolishing avgas would amount to £2,500,000. To put that in perspective, it is the cost of half a mile of motorway.

To sum up, 95 per cent. of British general aviation aircraft are piston-engined and use avgas, which is heavily taxed. The other 5 per cent. are jet-engined or turbo-prop-powered and use avtur, which is tax-free. The jet and turbo-prop operators could be said to be the wealthier end of the general aviation market, yet their fuel is duty-free and their less wealthy competitors use fuel bearing 46p per gallon duty. That is illogical discrimination, and it is dotty. This highly entrepreneurial industry, mainly composed of small businesess and self-employed people—exactly the sort of people we are pledged to support—does not need the millstone of avgas duty around its neck.

I have a letter from Mr. Danny Forman who, as chief executive of the General Aviation Manufacturers and Traders Association, has done a great deal to help commercial and general aviation in the United Kingdom. He has placed an advertisement in the aviation trade publications. The heading says, "Spot the Difference". Beneath it are pictures of two aircraft that look identical. Both have a crew of two and carry eight passengers. Both are low-winged monoplanes. Both have twin engines, propellers and tricycle undercarriages. Both are used extensively for business transport to save the valuable time of executives working for the United Kingdom economy.

But the aircraft on the left has a propellor turbine engine using avtur fuel, thus paying no duty or VAT. The aircraft on the right, used for exactly the same purpose and looking identical, is a propellor piston-engined aircraft using avgas fuel and paying 46·5 per cent. per gallon duty —and probably 15 per cent. VAT on top of that. Most of my hon. Friends feel that that is completely incomprehensible. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has demonstrated that he can and does axe taxes—why not this one?

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) has advocated the case so well that little remains to be said. I rise only to lend support to his argument. I have received representations from the Orkney flying club, in my constituency, which made a compelling case for the abolition of this duty. It not only finds the difference between avgas and avtur anomalous, but it has pointed out that Loganair's islander planes which operate in my constituency are all piston-engined aircraft and the duty paid on the fuel will undoubtedly lead to increased transport costs for those who fly back and forth from the main island to the north isles of Orkney and Shetland. That constituency interest is important, because of the increase in transport costs.

The hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside said that a fear had been expressed that, if the duty were removed, avgas might be used in cars. I have received a letter from the Orkney flying club that says that the problem is perhaps the other way round. Its secretary said:

"In private aviation many owners have turned to the use of car petrol in their aircraft. This saves considerably on costs, but since the control of quality on aviation fuel is very much stricter than that of car fuel, there must be a much higher risk of contamination and therefore a greater risk of accidents. All this for a very small return for the government."

I hope that the Minister will listen to the strong arguments made not only in this debate, but in other representations before the Budget. The return to the Government is relatively small and the removal of this anomaly or some concession would be welcomed even at this late stage.

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) has fought a vigorous and capable campaign on this issue. The House is familiar with the arguments that he has presented so eloquently, supported by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace).

The dilemma is that avtur bears no duty and my hon. Friend does not want to alter that; gasoline used by motor cars is heavily taxed; and the avgas which is used by the piston-engined planes to which he referred is usable in motor cars and could be diverted to them if it was economic to do that. To prevent abuse and the consequent loss of revenue, there is a good case for having a duty on avgas. Effectively, it either has to be aligned with motor cars and considered as gasoline—gasoline for motor cars is taxed, so why should it not be when used in piston engines?—or, as my hon. Friend said, they are both used in aeroplanes—as avtur is used in aeroplanes, and that is zero-rated, avgas should be too.

When my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary was Chancellor he entered into a judgment of Solomon. He decided simply to split the difference and halve the rate of duty on avgas. He emphasised that he saw that duty reduction not as a halfway shift towards complete abolition, but as a final compromise solution that took account of all the arguments of those in general aviation, who balanced those against the revenue burdens placed on other forms of transport, including essential ground transport.

I am afraid that there is no justification for further relief of avgas. It is, of course, a high-lead petrol and many cars could run on it, or on a mixture of avgas and petrol. Suggestions have been made that this could be prevented by dyeing and other measures, but I do not think that any of them would be satisfactory in practice and could be out of order in relation to aviation standards.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Avgas is already dyed, so there is no question of adding dye.

12 midnight

Mr. Lilley: The alternative would be to make it double-dyed. It would be difficult both to mark it in a way that is identifiable when it is in a vehicle tank and to stop cars and check whether their tanks contained an untaxed form of gasoline. We do not want to go down that avenue.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor reviews all taxes when he makes his Budget judgment every year. I cannot suggest that this is other than a final compromise solution, although as I have said, I am always open to receive visits from my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside should he wish to renew these arguments nearer the time.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): Colouring in petrol was introduced for the services during the war, but it never had any practical effect.

Mr. Lilley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has reinforced my argument. He provides practical evidence against the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth). With that support, I rest my case.

Mr. Colvin: I have listened to my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary, and I do not think that he has understood the argument, because we have had a rerun of what has been said by him and other Treasury Ministers who have been sent letters by those who have been lobbying on behalf of general aviation over the past 12 months. However, as he has made it clear that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and other Treasury Ministers are happy to review all taxes between now and the next Budget, and that he is prepared to see representatives of the general aviation industry before he makes up his mind, I am happy to leave it in the lap of the gods and trust that where I failed to persuade him to change the duty, they may succeed. On the basis of that understanding, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 10

POWER TO SEARCH PERSONS

Dr. Marek: I beg to move amendment No. 80, in page 6, line 31, after 'but' insert—

'The officer shall not require the suspect to submit to a strip or intimate search without receiving an authorisation from a superior officer of the rank of senior executive or higher and'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 18, in page 6, line 34, at end insert—

'(2B) The officer informing the suspect of the effect of subsection (3) below when requiring him to submit to searches of his person, whether rub-down, strip or intimate shall take him before a justice of the peace or before a superior officer of a rank of senior executive or higher, or in the case of the suspect being required to submit to a rub-down search, to such a superior officer if he is not satisfied that the suspect is fully aware of the effect of subsection (3) below.'.

No. 82, in page 6, line 34, at end, insert—

'(2A) The officer informing the suspect of the effect of subsection (3) below shall do so verbally and offer to do so in writing if the suspect so desires.'.

No. 79, in page 6, line 37, at end, insert

'(of a senior executive rank or higher)'.

No. 83, in page 7, line 10, at end insert—

'(5A) The Commissioners shall formulate a code of practice under which any powers in this section shall be exercised.'.

Dr. Marek: My right hon. and hon. Friends have tabled five amendments dealing with the Customs and Excise management of searching and detection of people who enter the country but do not abide by the laws on drugs and other proscribed materials. Amendment No. 83 is a comprehensive amendment. It deals with a code of practice, and covers many issues. Amendment No. 80 deals with the seniority of the officer who shall require a type of search to be undertaken. Amendments Nos. 81 and 82 are related in that they deal with a suspect being fully aware of his or her rights, and say that information on these rights should be made available not just verbally but in writing. At the least, the suspect should be told that the information is available if he or she desires to see it.

I hope that the debate will not be too long, as the night is getting on, but this is an important matter. The debate should not be party political as both sides of the House want an efficient procedure that is understood and respected by the public.

Customs officers have powers of search and detention. In many ways those powers exceed the powers of the police. When a policeman arrests a person, the arrest is covered by a code of practice. At present there is no code of practice for customs officers. Even though the suspect is not arrested, customs officers have powers of detention. I hope that I will get a careful reply from the Economic Secretary. It should be stated somewhere that customs officers will only use their powers reasonably and that any detention should be reasonable pertaining to the circumstances. If a code of practice is established, it should define what it would be reasonably necessary for a customs officer to do in pursuance of his duty.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Can my hon. Friend explain why it is necessary to establish a new code of practice for customs officers rather than simply to apply the code of practice which exists under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984? Having established after a great deal of parliamentary debate a code of practice for one group of people to carry out searches, why should we want a different code of practice for Customs and Excise officers? I fear that the Government's view is that there should not be any code of practice. If we want the public to know their rights, it would be much better to have one code of practice for all searches.

Dr. Marek: Home Office code C would probably do very well for customs officers. On the other hand, the powers are slightly different. Customs officers have a power of detention which is not a power of arrest. The Economic Secretary may say that there will have to be changes in the code of practice to accommodate the slightly different position. My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) may want to make a short contribution later to amplify the point.

When a suspect is detained, his or her rights should be imparted to the suspect verbally or by written notice. If a suspect is required to undergo an intimate or strip search, the suspect should have the right to go to a justice of the peace or a senior officer. In the case of a rubdown search, the suspect would have the right to go to a senior officer if he or she so wished.

Many suspects speak English well, and nearly all of them are accommodating; there are no problems because they realise that customs officers have a difficult job to do. I am concerned about the one case in 10,000 where a problem might arise. Human beings are human beings and we are all imperfect in one way or another. Misunderstandings can arise. In those circumstances, there should be clarification of the procedures so that the public can have confidence in customs officers. I urge the Economic Secretary to ensure that written notice is available to a suspect.

The written notice could be not just in English. Many people entering this country do not speak English, so it would have to be in a sufficient number of languages. We can never get that absolutely right. Some people are illiterate. We cannot take account of cases where people cannot read and do not speak English but speak a language that no official at the port of entry speaks. I do not ask for 100 per cent. cover in every eventuality, but we can go a long way towards that. Although we go some way towards that at present, it would be a great advantage if a written notice of rights, in various languages, were available.

I should like the notice to be in large type so that, if an old person had to read it, he or she would have no trouble in doing so. I hope that such bodies as the National Council for Civil Liberties and any organisations for the avoidance of gobbledegook would be consulted, so that the document would be easy to read and understand for people who were stopped at the port of entry.

If the suspect decides to ask to go before a justice of the peace, he should know that he can be in the presence of the justice of the peace when he hears the reasons for the officer's suspicions which led him to require that a search be made of the subject. Again, it is a question of making sure that the suspect is fully aware of his or her rights. I understand that it may not be possible to thrust a great deal of written material about rights into everyone's hand, regardless of whether they want it. However, a code of practice should be instigated whereby an officer, if he is unsure whether a suspect is fully aware of his or her rights, can go to a justice of the peace or offer written details of the procedure to be adopted. In that way, he can be satisfied that the suspect understands exactly what is expected of him. There is an Opposition amendment to that effect.

If there is an intimate or strip search, a record of that should be made and a copy given to the subject showing which parts of the body were searched. The code of practice should state clearly that, in the case of a strip or intimate search, no suspect should be left completely naked at any one time and that any such search should be carried out on only one half or one third of the body at a time. I hope that the Economic Secretary will be able to confirm that that is the practice now, but it should definitely be included in the code of practice.

The record of the search should also state why the suspect was searched and give the reasons for the suspicions. It should show the name and rank of the authorising officer and of the person conducting the search. It should also give the circumstances that gave rise to suspicion. My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) will confirm that that was recommended by the Keith committee but has not been implemented despite its being part of police procedure.

12.15 am

A code of practice should be able to deal with a situation, and let the public know what happens, where, for example, an officer believes that a suspect might injure himself or herself unless a search is made immediately. In some circumstances, that could be a real fear and lead to an officer having to make a difficult decision.

If a suspect is arrested, he or she has the right to telephone a solicitor. That should be made clear in a code of practice. Samples of urine or blood should be taken only if consent is given in writing. That is the case now and it should be spelt out in a code of practice so that everybody knows where they stand.

I understand that officers of senior executive rank or higher have to authorise initimate searches. That should also be the case for strip searches. They demand that a subject is partially naked and it is only right that SEOs or above authorise such searches. Unless I am persuaded by my hon. Friends, I would not go so far as to say that that should apply to rubdown searches.

It should also be clear that if a code of practice is instigated its findings would be admissible in evidence in any subsequent civil or criminal proceedings. Indeed, the code of practice used by the police says that.

Suspects in Customs and Excise matters do not have statutory rights, unlike those arrested by the police. Therefore, all the matters that I have raised require serious consideration, and I shall be interested to hear what the Economic Secretary has to say.

Mr. Darling: We had a useful discussion on this matter in Committee on 12 May. Opposition Members raised matters that appeared to find sympathy with some Conservative Members, although I do not see any of them here at present.

Whenever we discuss the Customs and Excise it is important to emphasise at the outset that most people recognise that its officers have a difficult job, being responsible for the detection of a large number of people who seek to import goods illegally or to avoid the payment of duty.

However, it is important that there is co-operation from the public and confidence that everyone will be treated properly and in the same way. It is important to remember that everyone who is stopped must be presumed to be innocent until they are found to have contravened some regulation.

As I said in Committee, most people have had the experience of being flagged down by a customs officer on their return from a trip abroad to be asked whether they fully understand what going through the green channel means and to be reminded of the regulations on bringing drinks, cigarettes, and so on, into Britain. I am sure that any hon. Member who has been so stopped has felt slight indignation and resentment at being seized upon because, as far as they were concerned, they were innocent and there was no need to be stopped. People are often stopped in the presence of their fellow passengers and that can be an embarrassing experience.

It would be useful for Customs and Excise staff to have a code of conduct of which members of the public should be aware so that they need not feel aggrieved and embarrassing situations need not arise. While I am sure that the vast majority of customs officers are very courteous and will explain quite patiently, sometimes in the face of abuse, what is required of passengers, unfortunately some cases have arisen from time to time which have given cause for disquiet. Some of those have led to very embarrassing and discomforting scenes at airports and ports around the country. Those cases have led to unfortunate publicity.

The code of conduct should deal with the circumstances under which someone should be stopped. My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) referred to the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 which applies only to England and Wales. I referred in Committee to the code of conduct laid down in that Act. That code refers to the powers of stop and search and deals in particular with reasonable suspicion, contrasting that with mere suspicion. It makes the point that reasonable suspicion must be founded on fact. It may well be that there are justifiable grounds to allow a customs officer to stop someone on a hunch. I am sure that there must be many occasions when an officer has a hunch and subsequently finds some goods. I do not know whether that is right or not and I am willing to be persuaded. However, I would like to think that a Customs officer has a reason to stop someone.

It would be useful if the officer had to record in writing his reason for stopping someone. When the Minister replied to this point in Committee, he said that he did not think that that would be practical, as about 44,000 people were stopped a year. However, it would be practical for a customs officer in a particular port to provide someone who is stopped with written reasons why that has happened. Sometimes the reason for stopping someone is discovered subsequently. In other words, the action is justified by the findings rather than the officer being asked to justify his stopping in the first place. There are good grounds for considering the issuing of written reasons.

It would be useful to remind officers that they must have a reason for stopping someone and that when they stop someone the conversation that follows should be conducted as courteously as possible. If possible, the questions put to the passenger should be asked in such a way that fellow passengers cannot overhear what is being said. Once a customs officer begins to go through someone's possessions, that process should be conducted in such a way that other passengers are not privy to the operation. That search can be very embarrassing and unnecessarily humiliating for someone who, as I said, must be presumed to be innocent until contrary evidence comes to light.

If officers are searching for prohibited magazines, or tape recordings, they need only carry out a search that would reveal the existence of those magazines or tape recordings. Two of my constituents complained to me that they were stopped and searched because they were suspected of bringing prohibited material into this country. They wondered why on earth they were subjected to an intimate body search and internal examination. Common sense would have dictated that that was not necessary if the officers were looking for magazines or tape recordings. It angers people when they are subjected to such searches because that may be construed as something more than a search. I stress that that does not happen regularly, but it happens and it can be an unnecessary cause of aggravation.

Intimate body searches, rubdown searches or simply body searches should be conducted in the presence of as senior an officer as possible, who is fully aware of all the procedures that should be followed.

We should emphasise that at no time should a member of the opposite sex be in a room where someone is to be searched. There is no reason why someone should not have a friend or relative present while such a search is being carried out. It can be frightening to be taken into a room in the presence of two officers whom a person has not seen before. I cannot see what prejudice can be suffered by having a friend present. Some people subjected to such searches have been shocked, frightened and scarred by the experience.

As a matter of course, the public should be informed of their rights at an early opportunity. Often, people are stopped and searched when they do not expect it, and they are not fully conversant with the rights and remedies that are available to them. I do not see what harm would be caused if such a code of conduct were to be published and made widely available.

Many of these points were made in Committee. The Minister's reply was disappointing. He seemed to think that there was no need for a code of conduct. As has been said, the police have one. I cannot see why Customs and Excise officers cannot have one. A code of practice would help Customs and Excise officers, and it would certainly help members of the public. Over the summer months, when, in the nature of things, more of our constituents travel than at other times, hon. Members will receive letters from people who have had unfortunate experiences. Given a little thought and consideration, most unfortunate experiences can be avoided. A code of conduct would be useful. The Minister said two months ago that he would think about the matter. I hope that he will give us the benefit of his thoughts. It would be a welcome step.

I do not believe that it will do any harm to have a code of practice—far from it. It would make the public aware of the difficult circumstances in which Customs and Excise officers work and the valuable work that they do. They need our support to do that work.

Mr. Lilley: I pay tribute to the way in which this issue has been debated in Committee and in the House. All hon. Members have recognised that Customs and Excise officers have a difficult but necessary job which, on occasions, must require extremely unpleasant tasks to be undertaken. We all agree that it is important to ensure that such tasks are undertaken properly and with appropriate safeguards. The clause that we introduced in Committee was designed to give legal backing to guarantees for the citizen. In large measure, they implement the key proposals on the issue.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) made several points. I shall mention two in particular. He said that the present law might allow customs officials to search people on the basis of mere suspicion. In fact, they must have reasonable suspicion, which is closely defined in law and by practice. It means that they require evidence—more than a hunch.

Mr. Darling: I fully appreciate that they must have reasonable grounds. I am willing to be persuaded that perhaps, in some cases, something less than reasonable grounds might be acceptable, but certainly not without a code of conduct. Under the law as it is presently framed, a hunch is not sufficient.

Mr. Lilley: I misinterpreted the hon. Gentleman's point. He suggested, if anything, an extension of customs powers, reinforced by a code of conduct. We do not propose to move in that direction. It would be hard to square it with the general tendency to tighten up civil liberties in that respect.

The hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) asked whether there should be a code of practice specifically for customs. Customs officers are obliged to follow the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 code of practice on arrest, search and questioning and have regard to the spirit of the code in matters to which it does not specifically apply because of the different nature of the two professions. Even after listening carefully to the points that hon. Members have made, I am not persuaded that it would be helpful to have a second separate and overlapping code for customs. It would be confusing in practice and would rarely be looked at by members of the public. Of course, it would add to the confusion that those involved in customs and police duties would face.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: The Minister says that Customs and Excise ought to follow the spirit of the code that is available under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act. Should that not be translated so that both the general public and the customs officers can see whether they are acting in the spirit of the code? If it is possible for them to do so, surely the code should be written down so that people can check it. It is the arbitrary nature of stopping and searching that has upset my constituents. If people can be told, "This is done in conformity with the code of practice; you have not been singled out for any reason other than the suspicion that you are smuggling something into the country," they will accept that as fair.

12.30 am

Mr. Lilley: There is no need for a code of practice in that respect, as it is established in law that customs officers must have reasonable grounds for suspicion before they can search anyone. If there is an objection to the way in which it is done, the matter is justiciable. It would not be made more justiciable by a separate code of practice spelling out that basic truth.

The citizen, in fact, has rather more rights when dealing with customs officers than when dealing with the police, despite the codes to which hon. Members attach so much importance. Above all, they have appeal rights, which they have not when apprehended in similar circumstances by the police. Those rights make a separate code of practice otiose in such circumstances.

Speaking to amendment No. 81, the hon. Member for Wrexham drew on our debate in Committee. He urged us to introduce written notification of appeal rights, aimed particularly at those who found it hard to understand or make themselves understood because they were not English-speaking. I took on board the arguments deployed in Committee, recognising that it is perhaps a weakness that in ports and airports written notification of appeal rights is not available in a multiplicity of languages—boldly presented, as the hon. Gentleman suggested—in case customs officers cannot make themselves understood orally.

That, however, is desirable in the first instance. As the hon. Gentleman recognised, in the overwhelming majority of cases officers obtain the consent and co-operation of the public. Although it is unpleasant for them, the public understand the need for such searches. We do not wish to bureaucratise and impede the process by providing for pieces of paper to be thrust at them each time such circumstances arise. I have, however, discussed the matter with the customs, and it has been decided that a booklet should be made available. It would have to be a booklet, as it would contain material in roughly 17 languages—spelling out appeal rights for those who need to know about them.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that, even with the aid of such notification, it would not be possible to be sure that the suspect fully understood his rights. He should in any case be brought before a justice of the peace, who, it was hoped, would have superior powers of communication and would acquaint him with his rights. I find that a rather difficult process to get to grips with. If the suspect cannot be made to understand that he has the right to go before a JP for his objections to the search to be heard, simply bringing him before the JP will not make him understand the position much better. But I trust that we shall never be faced with such circumstances—particularly as, following the hon. Gentleman's representations, the additional reinforcement of a written explanation of rights will be available.

The hon. Gentleman also argued that the appellant should have the right to be heard before a JP, and to hear his case argued. That is what happens in the bulk of cases. The evidence is heard in the presence of the suspect before a JP.

There would be cases where that would be inappropriate. For example, customs officers might have reasons for wanting to search which they could not reveal legitimately to the suspect because they were based on intelligence information. In such circumstances it is reasonable, at the JP's discretion, that the customs evidence should be heard separately.

I hope that I have covered all the issues that have been raised in what, inevitably, is a short debate and reply. I hope also that the concessions that I have been able to announce will go some way to reassuring hon. Members that we accept the spirit of their proposals and will do our best to work within them.

Dr. Marek: Will strip searches, as well as intimate searches, be authorised by officers of senior executive rank, or higher?

Mr. Lilley: Strip searches, as against intimate searches, are generally authorised by a superior officer to an executive officer. They would usually be authorised by a higher executive officer. Senior executive officers are not necessarily present or available at every port. If we were to require that only a senior executive officer could authorise such searches, unnecessary delays would sometimes be imposed upon the suspect, who would have to await such an officer being informed and brought from a different port. We restrict that requirement to intimate searches, which are the most infrequent and the most serious sort.

Dr. Marek: The Minister must know that that reply begs more questions than it answers. I recognise, however, that some progress has been made. I hope that the Government will study what I have said and consider whether further provisions should be inserted in next year's Finance Bill. Given the spirit of the discussion, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made: No. 21, in page 29, line 42, at end insert—

'(6) References in subsection (2) above to an individual include references to a Scottish partnership in which at least one partner is an individual.'.

No. 22, in page 32, line 16, at end insert—

'(6) References in subsection (2) above to an individual include references to a Scottish partnership in which at least one partner is an individual.'.—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Mr. Chris Smith: I beg to move amendment No. 100, in page 31, line 21, at end insert—

'"parties to a marriage" shall include individuals who have not been married to each other but who have lived together as husband and wife and the term "married couple living together" shall include individuals who are not married but who live together as husband and wife.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 101 in page 33, line 41, at end insert—

'"parties to a marriage" shall include individuals who have not been married to each other but who have lived together as husband and wife and the term "married couple living together" shall include individuals who are not married but who live together as husband and wife.'.

No. 102, in page 37, line 14, at end insert—

'"parties to a marriage" shall include individuals who have not been married to each other but who have lived together as husband and wife and the term "married couple living together" shall include individuals who are not married but who live together as husband and wife.'.

Mr. Smith: The amendments seek to remove the discrimination that exists in respect of maintenance payments that are made on behalf of children of unmarried parents who have subsequently separated. The Bill provides that for new court orders and enforceable agreements, divorced or separated fathers can claim tax relief up to a maximum of £1,490 a year—that is the difference between the single person's allowance and the married couple's allowance—on maintenance that is payable to the mother for herself or to the mother for a child. Unmarried fathers cannot claim tax relief on any maintenance that is paid.

For existing court orders and enforceable agreements from 6 April 1988, divorced or separated mothers can receive up to £1,490-worth of maintenance income tax free. Unmarried mothers will still be liable to tax on all the maintenance that they receive. This basic discrimination against the moneys that are received by unmarried mothers and paid by unmarried fathers, which do not qualify for tax relief, is something that the amendment seeks to remove.

The provisions in the Bill on the treatment of maintenance payments, in so far as they expressly discriminate against children of unmarried parents, starkly contradict the spirit of the Family Law Reform Act 1987. That Act seeks to remove all forms of legal discrimination against the children of unmarried parents. On 12 May 1987, the Solicitor-General said:

"it is the Government's view that, whatever one may think about the rights and wrongs of engendering children whose birth will be illegitimate, it is wrong to take it out on the children, in the sense that they are subjected throughout their lives to handicaps imposed by law."—[Official Report, 12 May 1987; Vol. 116, c. 220.]

The Opposition entirely concur with that sentiment, but the Government seem to be departing from it in the tax arrangements which they are making in the Bill for the payments made on behalf of the children of unmarried couples.

In Committee, the Financial Secretary said on 7 June that he would "study carefully what has been said during our debate to see whether further action is needed" and that he would

"examine the measure to see if it is likely to throw up individual hard cases which should be dealt with by amendments on Report."—[Official Report, Standing Committee, 7 June 1988; c. 320-321.]

I know that the National Council for One Parent Families has been in touch with the Financial Secretary and has pointed out to him its view that there will be serious consequences for couples separating in such circumstances, and that the impact on the children will be adverse.

I hope that the Government will be prepared to consider the amendments that we have tabled. We have beeen careful about the drafting. We have lifted much of the Government's own wording from their legislation implementing the poll tax, so I hope that we shall have no challenges from the Government about inaccurate drafting.

It should be remembered that the scale of the problem is considerable. According to the latest figures, more than one in five births occur outside of marriage. Thus, a significant proportion of children potentially will be affected by these discriminatory provisions in the Bill. On the basis of recent trends, an ever-rising proportion of the population is likely to be affected in future. More important than the numbers affected is the principle of equal treatment for all children, which must be defended. Such a blatant contradiction of that, as is enshrined in the Bill as it stands, runs against the principles established under the Family Law Reform Act and should not be allowed to pass unchallenged. We hope that the amendments will commend themselves to the House.

Mr. Norman Lamont: As the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) said, I undertook carefully to study this matter. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the starting point is that, under the new regime introduced by the Bill, there will be no relief for maintenance payments for children, whether their parents are married, divorced, separated, unmarried or widowed. The special problems of single parents are recognised to some extent by the one-parent benefit and by the additional personal allowance.

The hon. Gentleman drew a comparison between married and unmarried couples who have separated—indeed, that was his central point. I believe that there are distinctions. Marriage creates a special legal relationship which is recognised in the tax system. The married allowance is given whether or not the couple have children. The maintenance relief for payments by one divorced or separated spouse to the other recognise that such obligations may continue after the marriage has broken up. It gives relief for maintenance payments to the other spouse up to the equivalent of the married allowance. Again, the relief is available whether or not the couple have children. The clause does allow payments to the ex-wife for maintenance of the children to count for relief as well as payments to the wife for her own maintenance, but that is just recognising the fact that many of the wife's household expenses cannot easily be apportioned between herself and the children.

The situation is different for an unmarried couple. There is no formal legal relationship—I am not making any moral judgment, but simply stating the fact—and the couple will not receive the married allowance. If the courts order maintenance to be paid, it will be for the child rather than the mother. Extending maintenance relief could put the unmarried parent in a more favourable position than the divorced or separated because, with the divorced and separated, it is covering the obligation to maintain the ex-wife, whether or not there are children; it is not primarily for the children.

12.45 am

The amendments illustrate some of the problems of definition. They say that "parties to a marriage" shall include individuals who have not been married to each other. The amendments require the couple to have lived together as husband and wife at some time. They do not say when or for how long. There may be much more uncertainty about whether an unmarried relationship has ended than there is with a marriage, where there is a divorce or formal separation. There may also be unmarried parents who have never lived together, but I assume that the amendment is not intended to extend——

Mr. Hanley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the amendment as drafted could include two men or two women living together as husband and wife?

Mr. Lamont: I am not sure about that. I do not think that it does.

Inquiring as to whether an unmarried couple are living together is clearly more difficult than establishing whether a marriage has broken up permanently. The question raised was whether the absence of relief for unmarried couples would lead to hardship. It is ultimately for the courts to decide what maintenance is appropriate in a particular case. They will have to take the new tax regime into account, but it does not follow that they will necessarily award less maintenance than they would have done in the past. They will need to consider the facts of the case and the needs of the child.

If the courts award less maintenance, the result will often be that the mother will be compensated by an increase in social security benefits. One of the points I made in Committee was that 80 per cent. of single parents are on means-tested benefit. That includes people on family credit or housing benefit as well as those on income support. For those lone parents receiving maintenance who are above the benefit level, the fact that maintenance will be exempt from tax will be helpful. If they are not paying tax, it will enable them to earn more than before without crossing the tax threshold because they will have their full personal allowance.

I know that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury will be disappointed. However, if we make the concession for which he is asking, the framework of what we have constructed will come unstitched. The benefits system can pick up most of the cases. One has to decide what is appropriate for the tax system and what is appropriate for the benefits system to pick up. Some of the cases will be better dealt with through the benefits system. I know that the hon. Gentleman has put this forward as a serious point and I regard it as a serious point. I have looked into it and I know of his concern. We will keep the position under review. I hope and believe that his fears will prove groundless. It would be wrong to accept his amendment on the evidence we have so far.

Mr. Chris Smith: I am disappointed, but I am grateful to the Financial Secretary for the sympathetic consideration that I know he has given to the matter.

There is already evidence that maintenance payments are likely to be reduced in value as a result of the measures in the Budget. The Law Society's family law committee met recently and the decisions made at that meeting are recorded in the latest issues of the Law Society Gazette. Those decisions seem to suggest that maintenance payments will be lower in future. I fear that the problems we see as a consequence of what is enshrined in this part of the Bill will come to fruition.

We fear that the Government's apparent reliance on the benefits system to pick up the problem will not be sufficient in view of what the Government are doing to that benefits system.

We are grateful that the Treasury will keep the matter under review. We hope that there will be an opportunity to return to the matter, perhaps in next year's Bill, if it can be demonstrated, as I fear it will, that hardship does result from the Budget changes. In the light of the Government's commitment to maintain a reviewing eye on what happens, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed: No. 6, in page 50, line 23, at end insert

'or Part VII of the Housing (Northern Ireland) Order 1981'.—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 7 and 8.

Mr. Chris Smith: The amendments extend to Northern Ireland the scope of the business expansion scheme relief for the setting up of companies engaged in letting property. In our debates on the Budget and the Finance Bill, we have consistently made plain our complete and utter distaste for this use of the business expansion scheme.

One aspect of this group of amendments concerns us particularly. Assured tenancies under the Housing Bill do not apply to Northern Ireland, so the Government have come up with the amendments to enshrine the BES provisions for Northern Ireland. However, amendment No. 8 gives the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland almost blanket approval for establishing whatever terms and conditions of tenancy it considers appropriate under the scheme. At least with assured tenancies—bad though they are—we knew where we stood, because the provisions were enshrined in the Housing Bill. But amendment No. 8 gives the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland carte blanche to come up with regulations at some time in the future to set up a form of tenancy which will be the subject of considerable tax relief. We cannot but view this open-ended proposal with disquiet and we seek firmer information about the Government's intentions in the amendment.

Mr. Norman Lamont: As I explained in Committee, the market for rented housing in Northern Ireland is different from the market here, in that it is already deregulated to a substantial extent, so the new assured tenancy scheme will not apply there. As the BES relief in the Finance Bill is linked to the assured tenancy scheme, it follows that such relief would not be available in Northern Ireland. However, although Northern Ireland does not have the same shortage of rented accommodation, there is a shortage of good modern housing. We therefore decided to extend the BES relief to Northern Ireland, and that is what the amendments would achieve.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) specifically asked about amendment No. 8. It provides that in Northern Ireland a qualifying tenancy is one which complies with conditions to be prescribed by regulations. We intend that the tenancies should be broadly similar to assured tenancies in terms of both the type of property and the security of tenure. They will be very similar.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 7, in page 50, line 26 leave out 'or'.

No. 8, in page 50, line 28 at end insert—

(a) it is a tenancy granted in consideration of a premium within the meaning of Schedule 3 to the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979; or and in this subsection any reference to the tenant includes, in the case of a joint tenancy, a reference to either or any of the joint tenants.'.

No. 11, in page 50, line 33 at end insert—

'(3B) Regulations under subsection (3) above shall be made by statutory rule for the purposes of the Statutory Rules (Northern Ireland) Order 1979 and shall be subject to negative resolution within the meaning of section 41(6) of the Interpretation Act (Northern Ireland) 1954.'.—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Schedule 4

Business Expansion Scheme: Private Rented Housing

Amendment proposed: No. 12, in page 130, line 21, leave out paragraph 4 and insert—

(b) the interest held by the company is superior to any interest in the dwelling-house held by the individual.".'—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Mr. Chris Smith: In Committee we proposed that the disqualification from relief should apply not just to tenants of the properties provided by the company doing the letting but to subtenants. The amendment seems to enshrine that principle, albeit by a somewhat roundabout route and we must therefore give it a warm welcome and thank the Government for picking up the point we made in Committee.

Clause 51

Restriction of relief

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): I beg to move amendment No. 72, in page 53, line 15, at end add—

'(3) Where a company has been trading for a period of less than two years, subsection (1) and (4) above shall have effect as if for the amount there specified there were substituted £2 million.'

I shall be brief in view of the time. First, I wish to make a point about the difficulty that larger start-up companies with a potentially low return on capital will have in raising money. Secondly, I wish to get a clearer idea of what the Treasury see as the future, if any, of the BES.

One of the factors contributing to the Treasury's views has been the opinion of the Venture Capital Association that adequate financing exists from its members for start-up companies. In some respects that is unreliable and BES financiers believe that a certain number of projects fail to get venture capital, so never get off the ground. It would also be useful to know whether the Treasury will monitor this over the next year and, if so, how it intends to do so.

Mr. Norman Lamont: We discussed this issue at length in Committee. One of my hon. Friends tabled a similar amendment and I explained that it was right that the BES should be targeted more on small companies and that there had been too much investment on asset-backed enterprises. That would be good for small businesses and the venture capital industry. There can be arguments over the precise figure. There is no science about that. But we shall monitor this because we are aware of all the schemes that go ahead and, if it is necessary, we shall alter this.

Mr. Nicholson: I am most grateful to my right hon. Friend the Minister for explaining the Government's position on this and I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 24.

Dr. Marek: Will the Government forgo any revenue as a result of amendment No. 23 and have they had any representations about it?

Clause 94

ASSETS HELD ON 31 MARCH 1982

Sir William Clark: I beg to move amendment No. 106, in page 78, line 17, at end insert—

'(1A) That person may elect whether the asset shall be taxed by reference to the provisions of subsection (1B) or subsection (2) below and such election shall be made by notice in writing to the inspector given within two years from the end of the year of assessment or accounting period of a company in which the disposal is made or such further time as the Board may by notice in writing allow.

(1B) Where an election for treatment under this subsection is made under the provisions of subsection (1A) above the amount of the gain on the relevant disposal shall be calculated under the rules in paragraph 11 of Schedule 5 to the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979 as if references therein to 6th April 1965 where references to 31st March 1982.'.

I need not detain the House for long, but this is an important point. We have a time apportionment amendment to ascertain the value of property, shares or investments on 31 March 1982. The Revenue will say that that is difficult because a valuation in those circumstances would involve the long delay since the asset values in 1982. Earlier, my right hon. Friend said that the Revenue did not have records for rollover relief. I said on Second Reading that I could not understand that. When capital gains tax was introduced in 1965 the taxpayer had the option of a 1965 valuation or the historical cost to 1985 on time apportionment.

I cannot see why we should not do the same for 1982. One can easily determine the value of a share in 1982, but it is terribly difficult to ascertain the value of property and other assets six years ago. Will my right hon. Friend consider whether it might be much better to have a straight line valuation, from the historical cost up to 1982 and then up to now? That would be much easier for the Inland Revenue and taxpayers alike.

1 am

Mr. Brooke: My hon. Friend has identified the issue of time apportionment. At this time of the evening I shall put to him a case of how it would work: an acquisition cost of shares in 1972 of £10,000, a market value in 1982 of £30,000 and disposable proceeds in 1992 of £100,000. Under the Bill, the gain, ignoring indexation, is £70,000. Again ignoring indexation, with time apportionment the gain would be £45,000—half the difference between £100,000 and £10,000.

A considerable cost to the Exchequer would arise out of my hon. Friend's proposal. In fact, the sheer cost to the Exchequer would be sufficient grounds for rejecting it.

Sir William Clark: It is easy to quote a case of defining the value of shares in 1982, or whenever one bought them. But the valuation of investment property in 1982 cannot be defined as clearly as my right hon. Friend has said. He is oversimplifying the problem. The amount of work and expense to which people will be put in trying to determine a 1982 valuation will be tremendous. The burden of valuation will be put on the potential capital gains taxpayer. I hope that my right hon. Friend will re-examine —not necessarily now, but at some later stage—the possibility of alleviating the liability, responsibility and expense that will be put on the taxpayer.

Dr. Marek: Can the Paymaster General estimate the size of the concession that the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) is asking for? The Opposition see no excuse for it—especially at this time in the morning.

Mr. Brooke: The cost of the relief is unquantifiable, but it could well be as high as £100 million.

To answer my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark), practical experience of the time apportionment option for 1965 suggests that many taxpayers would feel it necessary to undertake an additional set of computations to see whether they would be better off with time apportionment or with 1982 market values. For those people, there would be an extra compliance burden.

Secondly, over the years a number of people have complained by letter that when they decided which basis to adopt, they did not fully appreciate the implications and made the wrong choice.

Sir William Clark: My right hon. Friend's reply was very disappointing, but because of the lateness of the hour, and because I will pursue it on the next Budget, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(a) during that period the company makes a disposal to which section 94 of this Act applies, and

(b) the period during which an election under subsection (4A) of that section could be made expires without such an election having been made.

(4) Sub-paragraph (2) above shall apply in relation to a company notwithstanding that the company ceases to be a member of the group at any time after the relevant time except where—

(a) the company is an outgoing company in relation to the group, and

(b) the election relating to the group is made after the company ceases to be a member of the group.

(5) In relation to a company which is the principal company of a group the reference in subsection (4B) of section 94 of this Act to the first relevant disposal is a reference to the first disposal to which that section applies by a company which is—

(a) a member of the group but not an outgoing company in relation to the group, or

(b) an incoming company in relation to the group.

13.—(1) In paragraph 12 above "the relevant time", in relation to a group of companies, is—

(a) the first time when any company which is then a member of the group, and is not an outgoing company in relation to the group, makes a disposal to which section 94 of this Act applies.

(b) the time immediately following the first occasion when a company which is an incoming company in relation to the group becomes a member of the group.

(c) the time when an election is made by the principal company, whichever is earliest.

(2) In paragraph 12 above and this paragraph—

"incoming company", in relation to a group of companies, means a company which—

(a) makes its first disposal to which section 94 of this Act applies at a time when it is not a member of the group, and

(b) becomes a member of the group before the end of the period during which an election under subsection (4A) of that section could be made in relation to it and at a time when no such election has been made, and

"outgoing company", in relation to a group of companies, means a company which ceases to be a member of the group before the end of the period during which an election under section 94(4A) of this Act could be made in relation to it and at a time when no such election has been made.

Schedule 8

GAINS ARISING FROM CERTAIN SETTLED PROPERTY

Sir William Clark: I beg to move amendment No. 71, in page 144, line 42, after 'settlement', insert—

'made on or after 15th March 1988'.

I wonder whether I might have more success on this amendment. I say at the outset that I have no vested interest in it.

There is an element of retrospection in this. If the settlement is on the settler's own interest, there is a liability of 40 per cent., but if it is for his family, it is 25 per cent. Consequently, there is an anomaly that should be ironed out.

If, as my right hon. Friend said in Standing Committee, the clause was intended primarily to prevent avoidance arrangements developing, my amendment proposes that, if any settlement is made after 15 March, it should be caught. However, for anything done before 15 March—probably 10 or 15 days earlier—there should be no retrospection.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Schedule 8 provides broadly that gains of a settlement in which the settler or spouse has an interest will be taxed as though they accrued directly to the settler. My hon. Friend's amendment seeks to confine that to settlements after Budget day. Existing settlements are already within the scope of the equivalent income tax provisions, and our main objective this year is to assimilate the rates of tax, gains and income.

To exclude existing settlements from schedule 8 would mean that the gains concerned would be completely sheltered from the 40 per cent. charge. Apart from that general point, this would be a substantial advantage and an opportunity for avoidance of the higher rate. There would be nothing to stop further assets being transferred into existing settlements shortly before being sold. The terms of an existing settlement could be varied so that the settler or the settler's spouse would be appointed as beneficiary.

I will consider what my hon. Friend has said, but I do not think that there can be any justification for creating a situation in which capital gains would be taxed at a different rate. In one sense, any alteration in the capital gains tax rate will be accused of being retrospective because it hits accrued gains. That is an inevitable feature of any change made at any time to capital gains. One could not have a safe harbour for capital gains for somebody who happened to have a trust before the 1988 Budget. In some cases the schedule 8 rules may lead to an increase in the tax rate on gains, although there will be other cases where it will be at the basic rate.

The position here is little different from that of other cases where higher rate payers pay tax at 40 per cent. of gains on existing assets. A number of people have put to me the proposition that it may be difficult for the trust to be varied, but I do not believe that that is so. There are a number of ways around that. I shall think about what my hon. Friend has said, but it would not be right to have a different rate just because a trust has been set up.

Sir William Clark: If a settlement has been made and it is not changed, why should not the provisions of my amendment be acceptable? If the settlement is changed, I accept that the extra settlement in the trust will be affected after Budget day, but if there is no change, why should there be this difference?

Mr. Lamont: I do not see why such settlements should not be subject to the same rate of tax as other taxpayers. There is no greater element of retrospection here. I raised the point about changing the trust because some people have argued that, if it is not possible to change a trust, trusts will not have the flexibility to deal with the higher rate.

Dr. Marek: I wait with bated breath to hear how much this concession will cost.

Mr. Lamont: The cost is uncertain—I shall go no further than that. I shall look at what my hon. Friend has said, although I doubt that he has a strong case. I should be happy to discuss it with him.

Sir William Clark: In view of my right hon. Friend's assurance that he will look at it again—if he will do so, it is obvious that the Treasury accepts that there is a case—I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 10

Building Societies: Change of Status

Amendment proposed: No. 75, in page 152, leave out lines 12 to 21 and insert—

'Capital gains: shares, and rights to shares, in successor company

5.—(1) Where, in connection with the transfer, there are conferred on members of the society—

(a) any rights to acquire shares in the successor company in priority to other persons, or

(b) any rights to acquire shares in that company for consideration of an amount or value lower than the market value of the shares, or

(c) any rights to free shares in that company,

any such right so conferred on a member shall be regarded for the purposes of capital gains tax as an option (within the meaning of section 137 of the Capital Gains tax Act 1979) granted to, and acquired by, him for no consideration and having no value at the time of that grant and acquisition.

(2) Where, in connection with the transfer, shares in the successor company are issued by that company, or disposed of by the society, to a member of the society, those shares shall be regarded for the purposes of capital gains tax—

(a) as acquired by the member for a consideration of an amount or value equal to the amount or value of any new consideration given by him for the shares (or, if no new consideration is given, as acquired for no consideration); and

(b) as having, at the time of their acquisition by the member, a value equal to the amount or value of the new consideration so given (or, if no new consideration is given, as having no value); but this sub-paragraph is without prejudice to the operation of sub-paragraph (1) above, where applicable.

(3) Sub-paragraph (4) below applies in any case where—

(a) in connection with the transfer, shares in the successor company are issued by that company, or disposed of by the society, to trustees on terms which provide for the transfer of those shares to members of the society for no new consideration; and

(b) the circumstances are such that in the hands of the trustees the shares constitute settled property, within the meaning of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979.

(4) Where this sub-paragraph applies, then, for the purposes of capital gains tax—

(a) the shares shall be regarded as acquired by the trustees for no consideration;

(b) the interest of any member in the settled property constituted by the shares shall be regarded as acquired by him for no consideration and as having no value at the time of its acquisition;

(c) where a member becomes absolutely entitled as against the trustees to any of the settled property, both the trustees and the member shall be treated as if, on his becoming so entitled, the shares in question had been disposed of and immediately reacquired by the trustees, in their capacity as trustees within section 46(1) of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979, for a consideration of such an amount as would secure that on the disposal neither a gain nor a loss would accrue to the trustees (and accordingly section 54 of that Act shall not apply in relation to that occasion); and

(d) on the disposal by a member of an interest in the settled property, other than the disposal treated as occurring for the purposes of paragraph (c) above, any gain accruing shall be a chargeable gain (and accordingly section 58(1) of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979 shall not apply in relation to the disposal).

(5) Where, in connection with the transfer, the society disposes of any shares in the successor company, then, for the purposes of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979, any gains arising on the disposal shall not be chargeable gains.

(6) In this paragraph—

"free shares", in relation to a member of the society, means any shares issued by the successor company, or disposed of by the society, to that member in connection with the transfer but for no new consideration;

"member", in relation to the society, means a person who is or has been a member of it, in that capacity, and any reference to a member includes a reference to a member of any particular class or description;

"new consideration" means consideration other than—

(a) consideration provided directly or indirectly out of the assets of the society; or

(b) consideration derived from a member's shares or other rights in the society.

(7) References in this paragraph to the case where a member becomes absolutely entitled to settled property as against the trustees shall be taken to include references to the case where he would become so entitled but for being an infant or otherwise under disability.

Distributions

5A—(1) Where, in connection with the transfer, qualifying benefits are conferred by the society or the successor company on members of the society, the conferring of those benefits shall not be regarded as either—

(a) the making of a distribution, within the meaning of the Corporation Tax Acts; or

(b) the payment or crediting of a dividend for the purposes of section 476 of the Taxes Act 1988 or any regulations under that section (building society interest etc.).

(2) Sub-paragraph (1) above does not preclude any qualifying benefit (and in particular, any qualifying benefit which in the hands of the recipient would, apart from that sub-paragraph, constitute income for the purposes of income tax) from from being a capital distribution for the purposes of section 72 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979, and in that section "distribution" shall be construed accordingly.

(3) In this paragraph "qualifying benefits" means—

(a) any such rights as are mentioned in paragraph 5(1)(a), (b) or (c) above, and any property obtained by the exercise of those rights;

(b) any shares issued or disposed of as mentioned in paragraph 5(2) above;

(c) any shares issued or disposed of, or to which a member becomes entitled, as mentioned in paragraph 5(3) or (4) above, and any interest in the settled property constituted by those shares;

(d) any payment in lieu of a qualifying benefit falling within paragraphs (a) to (c) above;

(e) any distribution made in pursuance of section 100(2)(b) of the Building Societies Act 1986.

(4) "Member" has the same meaning in this paragraph as in paragraph 5 above.'.—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Mr. Chris Smith: This amendment brings a substantial new section into schedule 10. It relates to the provisions for the transfer of building societies from mutual societies into public limited companies. As I made plain some hours ago, the Opposition remain deeply unhappy about the prospects of building societies converting and we remain strongly opposed to the rush with which one society, the Abbey National, has decided to propose conversion to its members.

However, one of the points that we made in Committee was that the same fiscal arrangements ought to apply to the issuing of free shares in a created public limited company upon conversion, as the Government were originally proposing. The Government have accepted that point and are including within the provisions, by means of the amendment, the issuing of free shares. That is a sensible move. Although we remain deeply sceptical about the entire process of conversion, we none the less think that within that process the Government's proposal in the amendment is sensible.

Amendment agreed to.

Short Speeches

1.16 am

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): I beg to move,

That—

(1) Mr. Speaker may announce at the commencement of public business that, because of the number of Members wishing to speak in a debate on one of the matters specified in paragraph (2) of this Order, he will call Members either between six o'clock and ten minutes before eight o'clock or between seven o'clock and ten minutes before nine o'clock on Monday to Thursday sittings, and between half-past eleven o'clock and one o'clock on Friday sittings, to speak for not more than ten minutes; and whenever Mr. Speaker has made such an announcement he may, between those hours, direct any Member who has spoken for ten minutes in such a debate to resume his seat forthwith.

(2) This Order shall apply to debates on:

(a) the second reading of public bills;

(b) matters selected under paragraph (2) of Standing Order No. 13 (Arrangement of public business) for consideration on allotted Opposition days;

(c) Motions in the name of a Minister of the Crown; and

(d) Motions for an Address in answer to Her Majesty's Speech.

That this Order be a Standing Order of the House.

Mr. Speaker: I announce to the House that I have selected amendments (a), (b), (c) and (e). I suggest that we have a general debate on the motion in the name of the Leader of the House. I will ask the hon. Members concerned to move their amendments at the end. Is that agreed?

Mr. Wakeham: I will set an example and be brief.

Before commenting on the amendments called it might be of help to the House if I were to give a sketch of the background to the motion, and what I believe to be its advantages.

Following a report by the Procedure Committee in 1978, an experiment was held in the 1979-80 Session, whereby during the Second Reading of Bills, Mr. Speaker was able to apply a 10-minute limit on speeches between 7 pm and 9 pm. However, no assessment was ever made of the experiment, and it duly lapsed.

A second experiment was carried out during the 1984-85 Session. This experiment went slightly wider than the previous one: the debates in which speeches could be limited to 10 minutes were extended to include Opposition days and Government motions, as well as Second Readings; and the hours during which you, Mr. Speaker, could implement the rule were between 6 pm and 8 pm or between 7 pm and 9 pm on Mondays to Thursdays, and between 11.30 am and 1 pm on Fridays. During the Session the temporary Standing Order was applied 24 times, after which the Procedure Committee subsequently reported that the experiment had been a useful and successful one, and recommended the continuation of the temporary Standing Order for a further Session.

The House did not agree to this until February 1986, and the Order came into force for the rest of the 1985-86 Session, during which it was applied six times. Again, the Procedure Committee monitored the experiment and this time recommended that the temporary Order be made permanent. Today's motion seeks to give effect to that recommendation and in moving it, I should like to thank the Committee and its chairman, my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery), for their work.

I propose just one alteration. Previous experiments did not include the debate on the Address in the list of those occasions when you, Mr. Speaker, might decide to restrict speeches. This was because the experiments, being sessional orders, were not usually approved until after the debate on the Address had taken place. I have added this debate to the list. As a major debate on the Floor, it is similar to Government motions and Opposition days in nature, and it would seem odd if it were not covered by the Standing Order I propose.

The pros and cons of a short speech rule were well explained in the Procedure Committee reports after each of the two experiments in the last Parliament, and are generally known in the House. I do not need to rehearse them fully now. The advantages are not revolutionary—not every Member who wishes can be called in a debate when the rule is in operation, but from the Chair's point of view, the rule does guarantee scope to call at least 12 Members between 6 pm and 8 pm or 7 pm and 9 pm.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): Am I correct in saying that this is the first time that this Order is being made permanent rather than experimental, and that it will be incorporated, as it is on the Order Paper, in the Standing Orders?

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend is right. It is the first time. The previous two occasions were experimental and were considered afterwards by the Select Committee on Procedure, whose recommendation we are seeking to implement tonight.

Moreover, judging from the experiment, the rule seems to have had a salutary effect on those speaking both before and after the two-hour period. They also have tended to keep their speeches shorter. On the debit side, there was perhaps a greater reluctance by some Members to give way when making a short speech, but interventions nevertheless continued to occur and the character of debate was not greatly affected. In any case, I do not think it practical to implement the kind of complicated stopwatch approach that the amendments in the names of the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) and my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) would necessitate.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that we are not talking so much about the stopwatch approach as about allowing you, Mr. Speaker, some discretion on the subject of interventions?

Mr. Wakeham: The wording of the motion gives you, Mr. Speaker, some discretion in deciding when to bring in the rule. The motion states that Mr. Speaker

"may, between those hours, direct any Member who has spoken for ten minutes in such a debate to resume his seat forthwith."

It does not state that he has to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I presume that you would be reasonable and would allow a Member making an important speech to finish his sentence, but that is a matter for you, Mr. Speaker, and not for me.

This is an essentially modest proposal, for a rule to be applied by you, Mr. Speaker, at your discretion, when you consider that the number of Members wishing to speak in a debate warrants it, and to be applied for a period of two hours only. If it were to extend to all Back-Bench speeches, along the lines of the amendment being proposed by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), I would not be proposing it. I consider it essential that Back Benchers should continue to be able to speak for longer than 10 minutes, if they wish to do so, perhaps because they are spokesmen of other parties, regions or committees, or because they have a particular constituency or personal interest, or a distinctive and complicated case to put forward.

I understand the reasons behind the amendment in the name of the hon. Members for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) and for Southport (Mr. Fearn), but, if we are to preserve flexibility, I believe that it is necessary for you, Mr. Speaker, to have the option of calling for short speeches during either of the two-hour periods proposed. I have no doubt that you will take into account, where you feel it to be necessary, the desire of the spokesmen of parties other than the official Opposition to speak before the rule comes into operation.

I recognise that the proposal will not find favour with those who argue against any restriction on the length of time a Member may address the House. Equally, others, as is evidenced by one of the amendments tabled to the motion, are pressing for the ten minutes rule to be extended to almost all speeches. Both my predecessor and myself have tried long and hard to find a solution that is generally acceptable and I believe that the motion before us is the nearest we can come to it. It is now for the House to decide.

Mr. Speaker, the House has now had three experiments on short speeches, the latter two being the subject of careful assessment and reporting by the Procedure Committee. The experiments were generally felt by the House to be a success and I believe that the time has now come to make this modest proposal into a Standing Order of the House.

1.23 am

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): I shall begin on a sour note by saying that, if anything shows that some of our procedures need to be changed, it is the fact that we are here at 1.23 am, when the nation sleeps, still rabbiting on about various matters. In many respects, our procedures are utterly bewildering to people outside. They do little to ensure democratic control of the Government and I look forward to other changes than the modest ones that we are considering tonight. I am in favour of short speeches and of the motion and, in making a speech on short speeches, I shall ensure that my remarks are short.

I am a sceptic about excessive complications in our Standing Orders. It is important that not only hon. Members should understand them but the public too, particularly if we are to allow the cameras into this place. Therefore, I do not want to see excessive rigidity in the way in which we conduct our debates.

The merit of the proposal is that it is restricted. It has been tested twice in this form in recent years and it has not drastically altered the character of debate in the House. The anxiety expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) that any restriction on speeches would limit interventions is legitimate, but in practice such restrictions have not altered the character of debates that much. The third report of the Select Committee makes the point that it is important for everyone to bear in mind that we should try to preserve the character of debate, which involves exchanges which enliven a debate which could otherwise be rather dull.

The experiment has shown that the proposal has the clear advantage of enabling more hon. Members to speak in important debates. The increase is not dramatic—three or four, or perhaps more, in a Second Reading debate. We all know the great frustration of not being able to speak. We also know the frustration of having to explain to bewildered constituents why we have not spoken on, say, the Second Reading of the Local Government Finance Bill, in vain pointing out the simple arithmetic that there are 650 hon. Members and, with luck, about 20 will be able to speak. We are an unusually large Parliament—I think that we are the largest in the Western world—so pressure on time is severe.

The proposal is limited and it has been tested. It may well be desirable to extend it in future. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) is seeking an extension of the 10-minute rule and there may be good grounds for that at a future date. However, at this stage the right thing would be to do as the Select Committee on Procedure has suggested.

Some hon. Members suggest that 10 minutes is a rather severe restriction. I have spent some time in an industry where 20 seconds is considered a generous allotment of time—scriptwriting for television—and working at the scripting rate of three words a second and 20 seconds per promotion, as hon. Members who are familiar with the Finance Bill will know, means 60 words, and 60 words in prime time is worth most other forms of communication available to any of us.

Anyone who can do the arithmetic will know that a 10-minute speech at three words a second is about 1,800 words. I tend to think that any hon. Member who cannot put his case in 1,800 words probably does not have a precisely thought-out case. I hope that I have managed to contain my speech to 1,800 words and have not badly overrun. That is about the number of words on the front page of most newspapers, give or take a little. It is a lot of words and it is important——

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): There are about six on the front page of The Sun.

Mr. Grocott: My hon. Friend makes a valid point, but I was talking about newspapers.

The advantage of the proposal is that it may well lead to sharper, more precise, contributions. It may make our debates more interesting to the outside world. Ten minutes is a long time, and I am in favour of the proposal.

1.28 am

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): I welcome the proposed Standing Order at long last. It has been on the Order Paper for nearly 18 months. I hope that some of the recommendations in future reports from the Procedure Committee will come before the House a little more quickly, particularly if we can debate them shortly and precisely.

The Procedure Committee has gone to a great deal of trouble especially to ensure that the character of debates is not altered. The former right hon. Member for South Down and for Wolverhampton, South-West, Mr. Powell, believed that the experiment would affect the complete character of debates and he urged people to vote against the proposal when it came before the House some time ago. However, the proposal has not altered the debates. There is flexibility open to Mr. Speaker as he can allow an hon. Member to speak for a moment or two longer than the 10 minutes—even though the rule is there—if the hon. Member has allowed interventions or if it is obvious that something needs to be said. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House stressed that point.

I believe that the proposal offers a major benefit to the Chair. While the Chair is in a difficult position because it cannot speak for itself, the Committee took advice from occupants of the Chair who told us that the proposal was a useful method to ensure that a few more hon. Members —only a few more, as this is not a revolutionary proposal —perhaps two, three or four more, could speak.

Mr. Dalyell: With regard to the character of the House, the hon. Gentleman's memory and mine go back 25 years to when he was the hon. Member for Reading. Why were the debates in the House massively more attended then than now? Is the hon. Gentleman sure that the character of the House has not been altered?

Sir Peter Emery: The Committee studied that point. If we look back long enough we discover that the speeches of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were thought to be quite inadequate unless they ran for five or six hours. I do not believe that we have lost anything in relation to the Budget speech. I remember when I was the hon. Member for Reading that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would speak for about two hours. He would wait until the market had finished. He would rise at 3.30 pm and not finish until 5·15 pm. Sensibly, the Chancellor's speech now runs only for about an hour. I do not believe that that has altered the character of the House; I think that it has improved it.

I urge the House to accept the recommendation from the Procedure Committee without the amendments. The most important amendment—with no disrespect to the others—is that in name of the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace). I understand that the minor parties might be concerned if they believed that their spokesmen might be limited in a major debate in which they wanted to make specific points because a statement had been made which delayed the start of debate until 5 pm. Half an hour might be allowed to the two Front Benches and at 6 pm Mr. Speaker might remind the House that he had announced earlier that the short speeches rule would apply. The minor parties would then discover that their spokesmen would be limited to only 10 minutes. I do not know when that situation arose during the experiment.

I believe that in many instances the House works on the good will of all sides working with the Chair. I believe that in the situation that I have described, the Chair is likely to be entirely sympathetic if a major point had to be made. The minor parties' worry, which the Committee considered fully, exists more in theory than reality. If it was found that that was not the case and there was a major objection, I am certain that the Procedure Committee would be willing to look at the matter again. On the whole, I believe that that circumstance would not arise.

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Gentleman is saying that the matter is at the discretion of the Chair. He does not agree with my amendments, but they come within the discretion of the Chair. They do not pose any dangers for minority parties.

Sir Peter Emery: I understand what the hon. Gentleman says.

The Committee accepted that there are several occasions on which it is necessary for an hon. Member to have more than 10 minutes to make a speech. I have implied that. We do not wish to leave the decision on which speech shall or shall not be of a certain length purely to the discretion of the Chair. We are trying to give guidance to the Chair and suggest that exceptions will be limited and should not worry the House. The Select Committee considered that there will be times when an hon. Member who has a specific or constituency point to make and who needs longer than 10 minutes should not be given prime time—in other words, before 8 o'clock. If the ten-minute rule can apply from 6 o'clock until 7.50 pm, an hon. Member who must make a lengthy constituency point will have a chance to do so between 8 o'clock and 9 o'clock, which is not prime time.

We do not see why an hon. Member who wishes to make a long speech must always be called before the ten-minute rule applies from 7 o'clock until 9 o'clock. It is perhaps a convoluted point, but it is a real one. That is why we considered that the Chair should have the discretion to call an hon. Member from 6 o'clock until 8 o'clock, rather than only from 7 o'clock until 9 o'clock.

This matter will be particularly important when the televising experiment occurs. Many more hon. Members will want to be called to speak. Therefore, it is even more important for the Chair to have the discretion to use the rule sensibly and sparingly. I hope that the House will support the Procedure Committee's recommendations and adopt the measure as a Standing Order from now on.

1.37 am

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): As the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) said, the amendment in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn) is directed to the difficulty that those of us in a so-called minority party—not the major Opposition party—fear might arise if the Standing Order were to come into being, with the possibility of there being short speeches between the hours of 6 pm and 8 pm. As has been said, there may be days on which there will be statements, points of order, Standing Order No. 20 applications, and ten-minute Bills. It has been argued that my party's contributions could possibly be limited, if the ten-minute rule came into effect at 6 pm. It was well recognised in the Procedure Committee's report that there is often a more general argument to deploy, and that should not be restricted. The hon. Member for Honiton rightly said that he could not recall an occasion during the experiment when that had happened.

You may recall, Mr. Speaker, one occasion when the rule was to apply from 6 pm, in the days when I perhaps had a greater community of interest with the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen). On that occasion, it appeared that there was an attempt by a previous speaker to carry his speech over into the 6 o'clock to 8 o'clock period. The hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) persuaded you, Mr. Speaker, to resume the Chair. You announced that, rather than running from 6 pm till 8 pm, the period would be from 7 pm to 9 pm.

From what I have heard tonight, I think that there is a recognition in the House that the minority parties have a general case to deploy, and it has been useful to get that on the record. Although we cannot ask you to give any undertakings, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you have heard what has been said by other hon. Members.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) argued that his amendment would not stop the Chair exercising its discretion to allow some flexibility to a minority party spokesman, someone with a particular constituency interest or, for that matter, a Select Committee member. When there is great pressure on the Chair from hon. Members wishing to speak, there are always many who are disappointed at the end of the day. The Chair would be put in an invidious position if it had to decide who should and who should not have a longer time in which to speak within the 10-minute period. For that reason, I do not particularly agree with the hon. Gentleman's amendment.

Nevertheless, I do not propose to push my amendment to a vote, as I feel that it has achieved its purpose of focusing attention on the position of minority parties. I am encouraged by what has been said, and I am sure that you, Mr. Speaker, will have taken note of it.

1.41 am

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): I am very sympathetic to the purposes behind the motion in the name of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, and I urge hon. Members on both sides of the House to support it. However, I find it more difficult to follow his logic when he says that he believes that the introduction of ten-minute speeches would have no material effect on the willingness of hon. Members to accept interventions.

It is obviously desirable for more hon. Members to be able to take part in debates, and it is equally desirable that we should all have an inducement to be as precise and succinct as possible. I shall try to do that this evening, even without a ten-minute limitation.

But it is, I feel, of major importance that nothing should be done to damage what I believe—if I can say so without pretentiousness, having sat in the House for only a year—is one of the great qualities that distinguishes this place from so many other parliamentary assemblies throughout the world. Many amount merely to ceremonial auditoria, with an endless succession of set speeches delivered in set times and in a set form. One of the great qualities of this House is the spontaneity—and hence, often the unpredictability—of our debates. There can be cut and thrust; there can be unrehearsed interventions and unprepared replies; there can be clashes of ideas and hon. Members can think on their feet.

I find it difficult to believe that hon. Members would still be prepared to give way to interventions, and that debates could remain as spontaneous, if speeches were limited to 10 minutes. I would be extremely wary of taking interventions if I had planned a speech that I expected to last for eight or nine minutes, because there would be a good chance that I would not be able to finish it in the way that I had intended. In extreme cases, unless an amendment were accepted along the lines that I propose, hon. Members might find that they were never able to rise to their feet again and complete their speeches at all.

There are two arguments against an amendment such as mine. One is that it is technically not feasible to extend the time to take account of interventions. I have not heard tha argument developed very credibly as yet, although I remain open to persuasion. It seems to me that it would be possible for the Clerk to advise you, Mr. Speaker, or your Deputies, of the time taken by interventions. Perhaps you or one of your Deputies could give an hon. Member a warning one minute before his time was up. If there had been interventions, he might find it difficult to know where he stood simply by watching the clock. That is not infeasible.

The second alleged problem is one that I too have some difficulty in understanding. It is said that if an amendment along the lines of the one that I have suggested were put into effect, there would be a danger of filibusters. It is argued that hon. Members could avoid a ten-minute rule by persuading their colleagues deliberately to intervene to prolong the debate. The House has lived with the danger of filibuster, and indeed its existence, for a long time. I have no doubt that some of the experts, such as my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), could tell us for how many centuries the danger has existed. It is one that could only be lessened if there were a ten-minute speech rule. I believe that the change would be only for the better.

Mr. Dalyell: The hon. Gentleman should be careful about the use of "danger". Parliamentary time is the only weapon that an Opposition has under our system. If ever the hon. Gentleman goes into opposition and he has a cause, he will be grateful for parliamentary time. The use of that time is not necessarily filibustering.

Mr. Davies: I take the hon. Gentleman's point, which reinforces my argument. The risk or possibility of debates being extended by speeches being extended unpredictably is not necessarily undesirable.

Before the House takes a decision on this issue, I hope that it will consider carefully whether there is not a means—perhaps along the lines that I have suggested, or along different lines—whereby we can get the best of both worlds, which is to say shorter speeches and all the benefits that they will bring along with retaining the essential quality of spontaneity of the House.

1.48 am

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): There is a good attendance in the Chamber, given that it is nearly 1.50 am. There has been much criticism in the newspapers about our sparsely attended debates, and usually the criticism comes from journalists whose only grasp of history is the knowledge of who bought the previous round of drinks. The criticism tends to reveal a lack of appreciation of the nature of the modern Parliament. We do not sit in the Chamber as independent Members listening to the ebb and flow of the debate, making up our minds when the Division Bells ring how we shall vote. A good speech might give us pleasure but it will rarely change anything in this place. We know that we are here because of our party labels. Once we are here, either because of the whipping system that operates within the parties, or because of our own ideological reference points, voting patterns are highly predictable. There is the occasional exception, but it is the exception that proves the rule.

There is not a political need for long speeches to attempt to influence the outcome of a vote. There might be good reasons, however, for long speeches in circumstances and on occasions other than those specified in the motion, but these will not be affected by the proposed change in the Standing Orders. As my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said in an intervention, the filibuster—the use of time—is the only weapon that the Opposition have.

I have in mind some highly controversial private Bills that have been before the House. Members have used their right to make long speeches to try to thwart such Bills. It is a legitimate tactic. It might not be liked by those who are sponsoring such a Bill, but it is a legitimate use of parliamentary procedure. That is not affected in any way by the motion. This morning, we are talking about debates in which there is a great deal of pressure from hon. Members to speak. In such circumstances it becomes extremely frustrating to sit there like Cicero or Demosthenes, burning to speak while some boring old fartbag goes on for hours and hours and rambles on endlessly.

There is no one as selfish as a Member of Parliament with a very long speech whose time has come. We have all had to suffer that. There are times when I believe that nothing is too horrid to happen to such a miscreant. I would want you, Mr. Speaker, to have much greater powers, perhaps a series of levers and trap doors which would send the individual plunging into the cellar, or perhaps they should be forced to learn by heart the collected works of the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan). He is not here, and it is always good to be rude about someone who is not here.

There is general agreement that ten minutes is long enough for most speeches. Most people would say that that is nine and a half minutes too long. As George Eliot wrote, "Blessed is the man who, having nothing to say, abstains from giving us wordy evidence of the fact." If Abraham Lincoln knocked off the Gettysburg address in three minutes, quite frankly, hon. Members with three times longer to make a point have ample time indeed.

My amendments seek to give the Chair maximum flexibility in announcing the ten-minutes rule. It is a matter of discretion for the Chair. It is nothing to be worried about. Under the amendments the Chair can exercise discretion and announce that there will be a ten-minutes rule at any particular time. Of course, that will enable the Chair to structure and order our debates. Not everyone who wishes to speak in a debate actually writes in to the Speaker's Office and gives notice of a desire to speak. It might well be only when the debate starts that the occupant of the Chair realises how many hon. Members wish to speak, or during a debate a large number of hon. Members are suddenly moved to speak. That would allow the occupant of the Chair to say, "In view of the number of hon. Members now wishing to speak, I intend to operate a ten-minutes rule."

We are not laying ourselves open to any danger whatsoever; we are saying that we elect a Chair and the Chair is there to exercise discretion on our behalf and allow as many hon. Members as possible to speak.

I see no reason to restrict the ten-minutes rule to certain time bands. Clearly, we are here to get what we are saying heard and detected outside. In terms of securing media coverage, that oftens means that the more points we can get in before 6 pm, the more likely we are to find the odd sober journalist capable of writing.

In my second amendment, I have accepted the need to allow Front Benchers winding up longer than the ten minutes. However, having listened to some recent winding-up speeches, quite frankly I believe that they do not all deserve such generous treatment. It is still at the discretion of the Chair. Both my amendments give discretion to the Chair. That means that Mr. Speaker, or whoever occupies the Chair, may direct an hon. Member to cease a speech. I hope that the amendments, which I have tried to move in a short and sincere fashion—which is a reasonably good description of myself—commend themselves to the House.

1.53 am

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): First, I congratulate the Chairman and the Procedure Committee on their work now and over the years, as this measure has taken a very long time. In 1966, the order was debated, but not moved. I and my colleagues then tabled early-day motions entitled "Opportunities for Back Benchers" from 1971 to 1984 when the experiment was introduced. It was unfortunate that it was only an experiment, as I believe that it has proved a great success. It is particularly important because the number of parties and, of course, the number of Conservative Members have increased.

As the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) has said, it is important that your discretion, Mr. Speaker, should still exist and that you can use it within the prohibited hours. It is almost impossible for people not to say what they want to within 10 minutes. I am sure that I may have exceeded that sometimes because of interventions. I can see that adding injury time for interventions is difficult. However, it would be up to you, Mr. Speaker, to allow the hon. Member extra time for interventions. I am told by the Clerks that it would be difficult to time the interventions and add injury time, and I accept that.

When I first came to the House in 1959 there were few Back-Bench Privy Councillors. Now, almost every other Member is a Privy Councillor. I once said to a Privy Councillor, "You are lucky now because you will be able to speak when you like." He said, "That would be an abuse of my power." It annoys many Back Benchers who have sat here for hours that a Privy Councillor can walk into the Chamber and without warning, within two or three speakers, he is able to address the House. That will have to be looked at.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that you have been giving a little less privilege to Privy Councillors. "Erskine May" lays down the rights of a Privy Councillor but that is out of date because of the number of Privy Councillors on the Back Benches.

[Dr. Alan Glyn]

After all these years we have at last reached the point where the House has to decide whether to adopt the order permanently. This is the first chance that the House has had to do that, as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has confirmed. Since 1987, a successful experiment has not been able to be operated simply because we have been unable to find time to debate the measure. I am sure that the experiment was a success. The ten minutes rule will give more hon. Members a chance to speak. I do not think that television has anything to do with the matter. There is simply more pressure on you, Mr. Speaker, because more hon. Members wish to speak and express their opinions. If they cannot do that in 10 minutes, they should not do it at all.

1.58 am

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): It is sad that we are now proposing to put the experiment into the Standing Orders permanently without having tried one or two other variations to see whether we could have done better than what I believe is a somewhat cumbersome order.

I think that everyone agrees that what would be most effective would be if every hon. Member showed self-restraint. We all know from experience that that does not happen. Every time, somebody—often more than one person—abuses the request to keep speeches to a reasonable length so that more hon. Members can take part.

If we are to have restraint, we should try to organise it in as flexible a fashion as possible. The most effective way is to confer greater powers on the Chair. I support the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks).

Let me remind the House of the greatest abuse. At around 8 o'clock, calculations are done; the Whips move from side to side and it is worked out that perhaps six or seven more hon. Members can be allowed to speak. They will probably have been present throughout the debate. Instead of keeping to the time allocated, one of those hon. Members may go on at length so that one or two of the others who have sat through the whole debate get squeezed out.

The great advantage in the amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West would be that the Chair could announce at any time that speeches were to be kept to 10 minutes. That would make it easier to formalise what the Whips try to do at the moment, which is to allow a given number of hon. Members to speak at the end of the debate.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): My hon. Friend is using terms that were never used years ago. The term used then was probably to the effect that it was for the convenience of all that the arrangements were made. Does he remember how Mr. Speaker Lloyd used to remind us that the Chair had a memory? Would not that memory help to reinforce the informal arrangements, which often work quite well?

Mr. Bennett: A possible alternative might be a blacklist or a memory of those who abuse the system.

We should be introducing a greater flexibility into the system, and we should have tried several other experiments. For example, we could have allowed the Chair to introduce a ten-minute limit at any time during a debate, as it became clear how many hon. Members wished to speak. I would also argue that a time limit other than 10 minutes may be appropriate on occasions—especially towards the end of the debate when we may be trying to enable several hon. Members to speak.

The members of the Procedure Committee may not be the best people to judge whether the experiment was of the best. By that Committee's very nature, those who serve on it tend to be hon. Members with considerable experience of the House. They therefore tend not to be called late in a debate. I suspect that not many hon. Members who serve on the Procedure Committee spent much time sitting in the Chamber during the experiment.

Although it was a very big plus that more hon. Members were called in debates during the experiment, there were at least two distinct disadvantages. First, many more hon. Members went to the Chair pleading to be called before the point at which the time limit came into operation. That does not seem to me to have been particularly helpful, and on at least one or two occasions hon. Members made pressing scenes in an attempt to be called early in the debate. It would have been far better had the Chair been able to make it clear that the ten-minute limit would apply as soon as the opening speeches from the Front Benches, and perhaps from one of the minority parties, had been made.

The second major disadvantage was that the experiment cut down interventions. Hon. Members felt that they would get their 10 minutes without being granted injury time for interventions and they therefore did not give way. It has been emphasised that the proposal before us provides flexibility. However, I think that it would be far better if the amendment in my name was accepted, to make it clear that injury time would be given. If it is possible for us to time the two minutes for Tellers to be named and the eight minutes for the doors to be locked, it should be fairly easy to time a 30-second intervention in a speech and to allow for that. If we want to have real debate, it would be better to encourage interventions, and that should be done.

There is also a negative reason why we should not make it too difficult for hon. Members to intevene. That is simply that if an intervention is not accepted, hon. Members tend to shout their remarks from a sedentary position. That is not a particularly desirable development.

The practice has been creeping into the House that when an hon. Member refuses to give way, a spurious point of order is raised into which the intervention is worked, sometimes with ingenuity but sometimes with little ingenuity. They waste even more time because you, Mr. Speaker, have to point out that it is not a point of order for the Chair. For both those reasons it is important to make it clear in any permanent change that we do not wish to discourage interventions.

There is the question whether interventions from both sides or only the opposite side should qualify for injury time. My amendment (d) seeks to allocate injury time only for interventions from the opposite side of the House because that encourages debate and interchange. On occasions an intervention from one's own side is simply a device for three hon. Members to get their view on the record rather than one. Sometimes when two or three hon. Members are waiting to speak the first agrees to accept an intervention from the others. Therefore, it would be worth while to make it clear that injury time should be given for genuine debate, which is usually across the Chamber.

I hope that the House will question whether we should put the proposal in our Standing Orders rather than continue experimenting with one or two imaginative options. If such provision is to be made permanent in our Standing Orders, I hope that we shall spell out that 10 minutes should not discourage interventions.

2.6 am

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): It cannot have escaped your notice, Mr. Speaker, in the long time that you have been here that Members of Parliament are extremely generous at least in one respect: in giving others our views. As you said to us when you first welcomed us to the House, with 650 of us that tends to make a few problems for you.

I welcome the motion in the name of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. I am sorry that I was a little late and did not hear all the earlier arguments, but it seems that there are only two arguments against it. The first is that it would diminish the rights of the Opposition, but Opposition Members who have spoken in favour of the motion made it clear that that is not the overwhelming view on their side. The second is that, because newer Members inevitably see themselves getting a smaller slice of the cake than senior Members, such as Privy Councillors, it is felt that as Members become more senior they will favour arrangements which benefit them increasingly.

There is a difference between a new Member now and a new Member as little as 10 years ago. Fifteen years ago only three parties were in Parliament, excluding one or two individual Members, whereas now there are 10. Fifteen years ago there were only three or four Committees, whereas now we have a whole structure of Select Committees and the Chairman of the relevant one is nearly always called after the Front-Bench speakers. The result is that Back Benchers' slot of the total time has got progressively less.

At the same time, for several reasons, some relating to constituency pressures and some to parliamentary pressures, hon. Members are having to spend more and more time in the Palace, which means inevitably that they are that much more anxious to speak in debates. Therefore, there is less time available, with more hon. Members trying to speak.

I have been fortunate, Mr. Speaker, in catching your eye 15 times—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"]—which I would not admit to if we were not so close to the end of the Session. That has been mainly because I sought to speak in debates on subjects that were not particularly popular. However, on three or four consecutive occasions some of my hon. Friends, having put a lot of work into their speeches, have tried without success to speak in debates on popular subjects in which many hon. Members wanted to speak. That is why I strongly support the motion.

I also support the amendment in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies). An allowance for injury time will keep up the spirit of cut and thrust. I also support amendments (a) and (b). Giving you that extra flexibility, Mr. Speaker, in no way forces you to use it; it merely means that you can extend the rule over a longer period if you choose to do so. I urge the House to support the motion and the three amendments that I have mentioned.

2.11 am

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) pointed out that a speech does not often change a vote. However, there are many occasions—this debate is one —when hon. Members just contribute ideas that throw light on issues. Such speeches may not change a vote, but they may change the situation. That is an aspect of debate in this place that is sometimes forgotten. On occasions, we try to persuade. It would be a great pity if we departed too far from the idea of trying to persuade, even if unsuccessfully.

Tonight I shall not oppose the entrenchment of what has hitherto been an experiment. My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) was right to say that there may be other ways in which to develop this idea. I shall not oppose the motion, but it is important to ensure that we are not creating a rod for our own backs that may turn out to be longer than we had imagined. It has been said that great benefits will flow, but we know from the table that the Select Committee on Procedure has provided us with—HOC 592 of Session 1985-86—that this rule will be used on the big occasions. When there is an international crisis, for instance, views on the matter have to be ventilated—not arguments made. Hon. Members have said that two or three more hon. Members might have a chance to speak. That may be so, but is that worth the complications that may arise? Some of those complications were outlined well by my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish, although I do not agree with his conclusions. Television may be one.

When we talk about getting into a debate, we often mean being able to send off a paragraph to show that we said something in the House. That will become a greater temptation with television. We must be absolutely sure that this problem will not become greater.

I understand the purpose of the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West, who is a living example of how easy it is for a person of ingenuity and talent to speak in this place. He shows up the false claims of hon. Members on both sides who often say they have no chance to speak. They may not be able to speak on the big occasions, but if they are as assiduous, and develop their parliamentary talents in the same way as my hon. Friend, there are all sorts of ways in which they can contribute—as he has shown. While I will not oppose the amendments, I believe that the House should be very careful, because the claimed benefits will be rather less than people suppose.

2.14 am

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I am uncomfortable for the sort of reason that has been given by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), with whom I shared an amendment that, rightly or wrongly, was not selected.

I concede that, of course, selfishness is intolerable. It was salutary for me within a few months of coming here to be told rather witheringly by that nice man, Mr. Speaker Hylton-Foster, that I would be punished for having spoken too long and kept someone else out of the debate. Speakers should be able to deliver such punishments, which is partly why we elect Speakers.

The problem is that that could spill over into something else. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South I cannot vote against the Standing Order as it stands, but what happens if people try to extend it, especially to the Committee Stage of Bills?

I say from the Back Benches, that the trouble does not only come from the Back Benches, but a lot of it comes from the Front Benches. I say quite frankly "Front Benches"—I am not just getting at Ministers. A very close personal friend of mine spoke for far too long on sport yesterday. Consequently, at 1.30 in the morning a number of us were kept out. I make no personal complaint because I had more than my share, but my hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), who really knows about chlorofluorocarbons, was kept out, along with other of my hon. Friends, because of unnecessarily long Front-Bench speeches. The sooner the parties tackle the Front-Bench speeches as well as the Back-Bench speeches, the better it will be for all of us.

I will be forgiven for being personal, but there are examples of occasions when those of us who had a cause —let us not dwell too much on the justice or otherwise of it—have been snuffed out at an early stage. In 1980, by keeping the House up for most of the night, I was successful in changing the policy on retrospective sanctions towards Iran. I am not saying whether it was justified or not, but I do not think that I could have done that under the present arrangements, because a Minister would have made a decision in that case. That is partly why my hon. Friend and I tabled that amendment.

I do not want to provoke unnecessary speeches from Members of the Scottish National party who are keeping a close eye on me, but at 2.15 in the morning one can be candid. The hon. Members know very well that George Cunningham, Enoch Powell and I would have found it very difficult to keep the House going for 47 days on the Scotland and Wales Bills under this dispensation, but it would certainly have been impossible if this had been allowed to spill over. Apart from the merits or demerits, this was a legitimate political act and, if we are changing a political act, we had better be clear about what we are doing.

Mr. Andrew Bennett: Does my hon. Friend accept that in all those examples there was not an end time limit laid down, so, in effect, anyone who wanted to speak could get in? Therefore, there would be no justification for the Chair limiting speeches. The proposals contain nothing that would do that. Those opportunities existed because there was no end time limit. No one is suggesting that it should be brought in in those circumstances.

Mr. Dalyell: My hon. Friend is right. However, he said that no one is suggesting at the moment that speeches in Committee should be limited. I started by saying that if this spills over into Committees, we are in a different ball game.

Sir Peter Emery: The Select Committee on Procedure looked at, and rejected, the concept that this rule could be extended to Committees. It is important that this should be put on record, because such an extension would be wrong.

Mr. Dalyell: That is accepted. I wish that the hon. Gentleman were right. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) is right.

I think of the late 1960s when, from the position in which the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) is sitting, my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), and, behind him, the late Jack Mendelson, used the House of Commons to make long speeches on Vietnam. Others may not agree, but I think that it was those speeches from those Benches that prevented Harold Wilson, who was then Prime Minister, from acceding to Lyndon Johnson's request to send what the President called a "battalion of bagpipers"—his words, not mine—to Vietnam. This was of major political importance, and an action of the House of Commons.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent has said that he is against short speeches, and if we had sat at an earlier hour he would have been here. I wish that he could have spoken for himself. He could not have done what he did, which was of crucial international importance, in the major debate to which my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South referred, unless he had the time to develop the argument.

Mr. Brazier: On an earlier occasion, the hon. Gentleman was courteous enough to finish his speech early to allow in the last hon. Member who wished to speak —that happened to be me. Therefore, I am surprised that he of all people should suggest that the efficacy of a speech should lie in its length. That is an amazing proposition. As we have already heard, the Gettysburg address lasted two rather than three minutes.

Mr. Dalyell: The Vietnam argument was complicated, and if one were to argue on equal terms with Michael Stewart, the then Foreign Secretary, who was an eloquent man, one had to have equal time to do so. It would have been impossible to hold the attention of the House otherwise. In those days, many people came in to hear what Jack Mendelson or a number of others were saying, because the argument was very much among members of the Government party. I do not want to be personal about this and what I say is meant in a flattering way, but I remember occasions when we debated other subjects, and Quintin Hogg, as he was then, could not, in 10 minutes, have made an argument that would sway the House of Commons and alter attitudes on penal affairs and other vital matters. To be eloquent, he had to have at least 25 minutes, and possibly longer.

Is it more important that major speeches should be made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent, Quintin Hogg, or whoever, or that three or four extra people should get in at the tail end of a debate to get their names in their local paper? I happen to think that the House of Commons is the place where people should be persuaded. We have to achieve an important balance. Those who are determined enough to get in at all costs should recognise that sometimes, on major occasions, the point of view put forward by an orator is more important than the fact that they are called to speak.

Often it is difficult to compress speeches. I give a current example. It so happens that in this morning's Daily Mail the banner headline is:

"Brittan back in favour—Exclusive—Maggie offers top job".

That raises all sorts of questions about the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) becoming a European Commissioner. People such as me might want to make a speech on this. We might want to ask how it is that the great job of European Commissioner should go to a man who in January 1986 for 14 days—[Interruption.] This is an example. For 14 days the right hon. and learned Gentleman supposedly—I repeat, supposedly—misled his senior civil servants, his Cabinet colleagues and his Prime Minister. This may be an unpopular view and I may be told quite nicely by Conservative Members not to do it, but I am afraid that it is an example. When we get to complex, sensitive matters like Westland, we need time to expose the case.

Next week, or some time soon, we shall be discussing the legislation on official secrets. I know that many Conservative Members think that what Clive Ponting did was wrong. I could never have made the case that led to all this if I had not had time. Parliamentary time is necessary to make a serious case. I do not want to draw on the patience of the House, but in a case such as——

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Is not the hon. Gentleman making a case for 10-minute speeches in that he has now spoken for 12 minutes?

Mr. Dalyell: Yes, and I must give way. I leave it like this. If one wanted to make a serious case about the appointment of one of our number as a European Commissioner, one would need more than 10 minutes to do it. On that I will sit down.

2.26 am

Mr. Tim Janman (Thurrock): I intend to be brief, but I want to offer support from this side of the House to the hon. Members for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) on the direction in which they have pursued their comments. I came into the debate very sceptical indeed about the motion. I have listened intently to the debate. On reflection, we may have before us a motion which gets the balance right. Certainly I could not support any amendment which sought to increase the area covered by the motion. If we did so, we would be in danger of pursuing a negative, egalitarian policy on how hon. Members speak in the Chamber.

Although I have been a Member for only a short time, it has not taken me long to notice that hon. Members vary enormously in their experience, knowledge and amount of intimate detail which they can bring to bear on a topic. Often if we are talking about a complex matter, I agree with the hon. Members for Linlithgow and for Newham, South that hon. Members who have much experience of a subject can take a considerable time to build a well-structured argument and to portray to the House the cogent case that they wish to present.

In the short time that I have been here and in the debates that I have attended I can think of only one example where I have heard a speech which, if the debate had taken place under the rules which the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) would like to see, might have been lost. I agree with the hon. Member for Linlithgow that we do not need to measure subjectively the rights and wrongs of the contribution at hand, but my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw), in the debate on the seamen's dispute, could not possibly have made his speech in 10 minutes, although he might have been able to tailor it down by five minutes or so. However, with his intimate knowledge of the dispute, being the constituency Member, if he had had to work within that constraint, both the argument and the House would have lost out, as he would not have been able to make that 20 or 30-minute contribution to a debate on which he was extremely well qualified to speak.

I do not intend to speak for 10 minutes myself. We may have the balance right on the motion, but I do not think that the proposal should be extended. I support the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) on the intervention issue. Perhaps it is true to say that, if colleagues like myself, who are new to the House, sometimes feel a little put out when more senior Members have an opportunity to speak, then our turn will come. We should not therefore be too impatient, but should be reasonably relaxed about the way in which the House works in that respect.

2.30 am

Mr. Wakeham: I agree with the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) that there are too many long speeches from the Front Benches. In my previous incarnation, I did everything I could to curb them and my right hon. and learned Friend the Patronage Secretary is doing his best now.

I am grateful to everyone who has taken part in the debate. It has been a good debate and I am grateful for the support for the motion, although it has been given with varying degrees of enthusiasm. The House should heed those hon. Members who issued words of caution about going too far and I agree with virtually everything that has been said.

It would not be right to go any further than the Procedure Committee has recommended. It has considered the matter more than once. If hon. Members who have tabled amendments wish to press them, that is their right, but, if they do so, I shall certainly ask the House to reject them. To dissuade them from pressing their amendments, I should say that, if problems occur after a reasonable time, I am sure that it will be possible for the Procedure Committee to reconsider the matter. The fact that the Standing Order was there would not necessarily mean that it was there for ever and a day. I believe that it is the right proposal and that it is right to bring it into the Standing Orders, but, if there are difficulties, we shall face up to them and see what has to be done.

Mr. Dalyell: We should be clear about one point. If my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) were expressing a point of view about the 1960s and Vietnam, could you, Mr. Speaker, make a judgment that my right hon. Friend should be heard further? Would that be within your power, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Wakeham: Obviously, it is for you, Mr. Speaker, to interpret the Standing Orders, but—if I may express a personal view—it appears clear from my motion that Mr. Speaker may direct a Member who has spoken for 10 minutes to resume his seat forthwith. The fact that the motion states that you, Mr. Speaker, may do so implies that you do not have to do so. Therefore, if you believe that it is right for an hon. Member to exceed the 10 minutes, the wording of my motion would allow you to do so.

Mr. Dalyell: Are we clear, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that you have discretion in the matter?

Mr. Wakeham: We are absolutely clear about that. As it is a matter for Mr. Speaker's discretion, the final judgment on how that is to be exercised is for Mr. Speaker, not me, but my reading of it is that in the circumstances outlined by the hon. Gentleman, Mr. Speaker would have the discretion to allow the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) to speak for more than 10 minutes.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Is it the view of the Leader of the House that that discretion should extend to time being added on for interventions? It would help me in deciding whether to push my amendment to a vote to have it clearly on the record whether that is the will of the House. Certainly during the experiment many hon. Members felt that if they gave way they would lose some of the time allocated to them.

Mr. Wakeham: Looking back to the experiment, interventions still occurred and hon. Members managed to make their speeches within 10 minutes. The character of the debate was not severely altered in any way that would deter us from making the arrangement permanent.

My view is that the matter must be left to Mr. Speaker. I believe that he would be acting according to the will of the House if he allowed an hon. Member more time because he had seriously failed to put over his point of view in the 10 minutes or wanted a bit longer because of interventions. I should have thought that that would be perfectly acceptable to the House and I would not wish to quarrel with that.

Mr. Dalyell: Part of the reason why I push this point is that some of us think that it is desperately important that Mr. Speaker should have the power to protect the unpopular view. The difficulty is that the unpopular view often takes some time to explain. As soon as one expresses an unpopular view, be it about Westland or anything else, it needs time. That is why Mr. Speaker must have it in mind that part of his job is, on occasions, to protect the hon. Member who wishes to express an unpopular view.

Mr. Wakeham: We elect Mr. Speaker because we believe that he can exercise judgment and discretion in such matters. The motion allows him to exercise that discretion in the right cases.

Sir Peter Emery: The Procedure Committee understands the argument that has been put forward by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). That is why, where there is a need for, say, the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), to make a long point, Mr. Speaker has a period during which he can call somebody without the ten minutes rule applying. That is why the point made by the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) is not applicable. The Select Committee has realised that there are times when hon. Members need to make longer speeches. Mr. Speaker can allow such a speech to be made at the appropriate time.

Mr. Wakeham: There is no doubt that the essence of the motion would allow Mr. Speaker discretion.

Mr. Grocott: It is clearly the spirit of the Select Committee's recommendation that interventions enliven debate. It draws attention to that. It is my understanding of the debate that it is a near-unanimous view that, if interventions were lost, that would be to the detriment of the quality of debate. If that is understood on both sides of the House, I am sure that Mr. Speaker appreciates and understands that all hon. Members hope that the discretion given to him in the proposal will be exercised in favour of allowing interventions.

Mr. Wakeham: Fine. I think that that should have cleared up most of the points that have been worrying people. If anyone is in any doubt, I remind the House that the rule will apply to Privy Councillors and everyone else.

Mr. Spearing: Although I am aware that the hour is late, I must make this point because I cannot make it at another time. Is the Leader of the House aware that we are not simply talking about Mr. Speaker, but about the occupant of the Chair? I did not blame the previous occupant of the Chair at the time of the experiment for using his power of intervention to the second. The motion gives a discretion of "may". The House appears to feel that an intervention should not be made to the second, but that the occupant of the Chair should take account of the end of a sentence or, conceivably, of interventions. That raises difficulties for the occupant of the Chair that we have not discussed, although they are illustrated by some of the points that we have made. Although the feeling of the House is clear, I hope that the Leader of the House will agree that the occupant of the Chair has a little more flexibility than was exercised during the experiment.

Mr. Wakeham: Mr. Speaker will have heard the debate. He must decide how to exercise his discretion. I should think that he would exercise it to the general satisfaction of the House.

Ordered,

That—

(1) Mr. Speaker may announce at the commencement of public business that, because of the number of Members wishing to speak in a debate on one of the matters specified in paragraph (2) of this Order, he will call Members either between six o'clock and ten minutes before eight o'clock or between seven o'clock and ten minutes before nine o'clock on Monday to Thursday sittings, and between half-past eleven o'clock and one o'clock on Friday sittings, to speak for not more than ten minutes; and whenever Mr. Speaker has made such an announcement he may, between those hours, direct any Member who has spoken for ten minutes in such a debate to resume his seat forthwith.

(2) This Order shall apply to debates on:

(a) the second reading of public bills;

(b) matters selected under paragraph (2) of Standing Order No. 13 (Arrangement of public business) for consideration on allotted Opposition days;

(c) Motions in the name of a Minister of the Crown; and

(d) Motions for an Address in answer to Her Majesty's Speech.

That this Order be a Standing Order of the House.

Mentally Disordered Prisoners

Motion made and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Alan Howarth.]

3.3 am

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (Norfolk, South-West): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise this matter, even at such an unsocial hour. My hon. Friend the Minister will recall the debate on prisons on 12 May. He will also recall that, although that debate was wide-ranging, the question of mentally disordered offenders in our prisons was not raised, although from time to time it appears in parliamentary questions, and two years ago it was raised in an Adjournment debate.

This morning I shall not explore the inadequacy of our prison system to deal with the mentally disordered offender—although that is not in dispute—nor do I wish to complain about the lack of alternatives for such people. Rather I wish to ask how it is, given the legal framework provided by the Mental Health Act 1983, that any offenders with a mental disorder as defined under the Act are in our prisons.

The Government are to be congratulated on their ambitious building and refurbishing programme for prisons. There has been a 117 per cent. increase in capital expenditure on prisons since 1979. By the mid-1990s we shall have 26 new prisons. At the prison in my constituency at Wayland near Watton, which is a new prison, the work being done demonstrates what a difference it can make to prisoners and staff to work in up-to-date surroundings.

It is true that our prison population is among the highest in developed countries. However, the Government have been energetic in pursuing alternatives to custody while balancing those with the proper public concern about safety and security in the light of increasing numbers of crimes of violence.

Despite those achievements, the prison service is under strain. The conditions in which some prisoners have to live are unacceptable by any standards and our prisons are peculiarly illequipped to deal with mentally disordered offenders. What is more, they and the staff could do without the additional problems created by the presence of such offenders. Therefore, it is all the more curious that there should have been as many as 315 mentally disordered offenders, as defined by the Mental Health Act 1983, in our prisons on the last date of counting, which was 30 September 1986, when a perfectly satisfactory legal framework exists to prevent their admission in the first place.

Apart from the additional strain imposed on the prison service by the presence of those offenders, conditions in prisons are not likely to help their illness. The Select Committee on Social Services found in 1986 that prison medical officers prepared for the courts in 15 months more than 9,000 psychiatric reports, compared with 219 physical health reports on people remanded in custody for medical assessment. Only 40 per cent. of prison medical officers have a qualification in psychiatry. Therefore, some psychiatric reports are prepared by people who are not psychiatrists. It is clearly of the utmost importance that court reports should be capable of giving good professional advice on whether a person should be sent to prison or dealt with through the hospital or probation systems.

[Mrs. Gillian Shephard]

There are far more mentally disordered people in our prisons than those defined as treatable under the Mental Health Act. The report of the Select Committee on Social Services suggested that there could be as many as 1,500 male prisoners suffering from a mental disorder. That figure does not necessarily include those who become disordered after admission.

The treatment available to those offenders is restricted by the prison environment and by the availability of appropriately trained staff. There are considerable problems surrounding the issues of consent to treatment. Prisoners remanded to hospital under section 36 of the Mental Health Act are subject to the consent to treatment provisions contained in section 58. Prisoners in prison are not, with the result that those who administer medication have to rely on the common law for their justification and the prisoner has no rights at all. There can be no doubt that prison medical officers are under pressure to tranquillise a difficult patient, even without his consent, when the alternative is a prison for the disturbed. That is fair on neither the doctor nor prisoner.

If conditions in prisons are so unsatisfactory for those suffering from a mental disorder and if their presence places an additional strain on a system which, for the moment, is somewhat overburdened, why are they admitted in the first place? Some would suggest a lack of alternative placements but I would not. Thirteen of the 14 regional health authorities have permanent regional secure units. The remaining region, South West Thames, proposes RSU provision which is to function in association with several "close supervision" units already operating in existing hospitals.

Although this is primarily a matter for the Department of Health and Social Security it obviously impinges on the prison service and the offenders to whom I am referring. The use to which the RSUs are put, the admission criteria and the local co-operation and co-ordination between all the relevant agencies, particularly the consultant psychiatrist responsible for the RSU, are more important than the number of places available. However, that too is being watched by the DHSS, which is awaiting the results of a research study on the eventual national need for such secure accommodation.

In Norfolk, we have the East Anglian regional secure unit based at Thorpe St. Andrew near Norwich. It has 36 beds but, interestingly enough, for the first 18 months or so of the unit's existence, only 16 of them were occupied. Not only was that clearly very wasteful of the overall investment, it did not allow the unit to function as intended.

Fortunately, the regional health authority medical officer was able to ensure that occupancy rates became more realistic, and the unit is at last performing the task for which it was built at huge expense. However, what happened in Norfolk may well be replicated elsewhere in the country.

I would not agree with those who argue that special hospitals need more finance. There has been considerable investment in such hospitals in recent years, not least at Broadmoor, where a completely new building is being provided right now. More important than providing yet more money for special hospitals is the minimising of delays for those awaiting transfer from prison, and that means speeding up the provision of reports and other admission procedures.

Given that our prisons are already under strain—for the moment anyway—and are not equipped with either the buildings or the staff to deal with mentally disordered offenders—and if alternative provision exists outside—why are 315 mentally disordered people, as defined under the Act, in the prison system? I suggest that it is because, despite the legal framework that exists to prevent it, there is still an imperfect understanding on the part of the courts of the alternatives available to them, and an imperfect relationship at local level between the judiciary, the penal system and the Health Service which, if it were used properly, could ensure a better use of facilities and a better disposal for the individual. Unfortunately for the moment, that arrangement does not function correctly.

The second biennial report of the Mental Health Act Commission, published last autumn, makes some interesting points. The commission set itself the task of collecting basic data that would give a broad indication of the level of achievement in practice of sections 35 to 38 of the 1983 Act, which provided that offenders who were thought to be, or had been judged to be, mentally disordered should not be held in prison. The commission was particularly interested in the extent of the use of section 35, which gives the power for remand to hospital for report to be used when remand on bail is felt to be inappropriate.

Two projects were set up. One in a Crown court division fell by the wayside because of the small number of returns made. The other was conducted with all the 314 magistrates' courts in England and Wales. Its aim was to chart the progress of defendants remanded for psychiatric reports from remand to final disposal over a three-month period. Returns were made on 241 cases. In 41 of those cases, despite the fact that the offenders could have been remanded to hospital for psychiatric reports, they were remanded in custody. Twelve per cent. were remanded to hospital as a condition of bail and only 11 per cent. were remanded to hospital under section 35; 36 per cent. got unconditional bail.

Given the high hopes attached to that part of the Act when it came into force, those figures are disappointing by anyone's standards. They may be explained by a variety of factors. Lack of familiarity with the provisions of the Act on the part of the courts looms large among them. Another is reluctance on the part of doctors to accept remands under section 35, possibly because such patients are also subject to common law principles on consent for treatment.

What happened to the 99—the 41 per cent.—who were first remanded in custody? Of those, 32 received hospital orders under section 37; two received interim hospital orders under section 38; 17 were imprisoned; and 48 received non-custodial sentences. The point about those figures is that during that period our prison service was burdened with a further 99 offenders all of whom might have been remanded to hospital under section 35 for report, and of whom a third ended up in hospital in any case, and half got non-custodial sentences. Of the 26 who were remanded under section 35, 15 got hospital orders under section 37 and nine got non-custodial sentences, which suggests that in their cases the use of section 35 was the right disposal.

I know that there has been a joint Home Office-DHSS working group, which reported last autumn to Ministers on some of these questions, and that the Government accepted all the 16 recommendations. I would particularly welcome information from my hon. Friend the Minister about the exact ways in which at local level, both magistrates and Crown courts and their officials are being made aware of their powers under sections 35 to 38 of the Act, and what effect this has had in the past six months on reducing the number of mentally disordered offenders in our prisons.

I should be grateful for any information on progress to encourage co-operation between judicial, penal and health services at local level, and the kind of information now required by courts about the availability of beds and so on. My hon. Friend will be familiar with the recommendation of the commission that more consideration be given to sections 35 and 36 with a view to giving a single power for both reports and treatment.

Our prisons have problems. Given that the Government are making such vigorous efforts to overcome them and that the 1983 Act is Government legislation, it is the Government's responsibility to ensure that the success of the one programme is not jeopardised by less than satisfactory functioning at local level of the other.

3.16 pm

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South-West (Mrs. Shephard) for allowing me to intervene briefly. I wholeheartedly support her arguments. Clearly, prison is not the right place for many categories of mentally ill offenders, particularly schizophrenics.

My hon. Friend referred to the East Anglian regional secure unit, which is in my constituency. I have experience of, and have had talks about, what happens in Norwich prison. Many problems there serve only to underline what my hon. Friend has said. Recently, we have had suicides in prisons in the United Kingdom which also serve to underline the seriousness of this issue. I welcome the Home Office guidelines which were detailed in a written reply to me some months ago.

I should like briefly to draw attention to the work of the National Schizophrenia Fellowship both nationally and in Norwich in supporting families and campaigning on these issues. My hon. Friend referred to sections 35 to 39 of the Mental Health Act 1983. We may have to go further than she has suggested and amend the legislation so that health authorities cannot escape their obligations so easily and so that mentally ill patients are kept out of our often overcrowded prisons.

The continuing closure of our large mental hospitals is undoubtedly exacerbating this problem. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will talk urgently with colleagues in the DHSS about that matter and the other points that we have raised.

3.18 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I am very grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South-West (Mrs. Shephard) for giving the House this opportunity to discuss the treatment of the mentally disturbed individuals who come before the courts. If I may say so, she has reviewed the problems with considerable clarity and is right to stress that the prison environment is not an appropriate place for keeping mentally disordered people. I suspect that her analysis of the reasons why there are in the prison system as convicted persons a number of mentally disordered people is, broadly speaking, correct.

There is no doubt that this is an important issue which causes the Government considerable anxiety. The House will be aware that my right hon. Friends the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Social Services set up in 1986 an interdepartmental working group on mentally disturbed offenders. It reported last year, and all its substantial recommendations were accepted by the Government. I am glad to say that good headway is being made with implementation of those recommendations.

My hon. Friend has asked me a number of specific questions. At the moment I am not in a position to answer them in the detail that she would like. For some time past I have been concerned with this issue. I am now trying to draw up for my own purposes a schedule of the sort of issues that the Home Office and the DHSS need to address, with a view to determining how we can reduce the number of mentally disordered people in the prison service. When I have had a chance to review the options I shall be in a better position to answer the sort of questions that my hon. Friend has asked tonight. I hope she will forgive me for saying that I find it difficult at this stage to give the sort of conclusive view that she wants. She has anticipated my deliberations by some weeks.

It is important to recognise that there is no single category of mentally disordered offenders. There is a complex group of people with differing medical conditions and varying needs for treatment, care and control. We must also recognise that psychiatric medicine is going through a period of fundamental change. Professional attitudes towards the way in which patients should be treated have changed profoundly. Change on this scale is bound to cause strains and dislocation.

An important distinction has to be made between people whose mental disorder falls within the scope of the Mental Health Act 1983 and who consequently may be detained in hospital for treatment, and those who, while they are mentally disordered, do not suffer to a degree that warrants their detention in hospital. These are separate groups, and we need to examine their problems individually.

People whose mental disorder brings them within the scope of the Mental Health Act can be dealt with in a variety of ways. Section 136 authorises the police to take them to hospital for assessment if they are found in a public place and appear to be in need of care or control. That applies whether or not they have committed an offence, and is a useful way of enabling the police to divert minor offenders from the courts.

I suspect that the police do not make sufficient use of this power. I also suspect that too often people are brought before the courts for relatively minor offences when they could be dealt with under the section to which I have referred. I should like the police to consider using that section more frequently.

When the police and the Crown prosecution service believe it is in the public interest to proceed with a prosecution, the courts have a number of powers available to them. Courts wishing to obtain psychiatric reports on defendants do not, of course, have to rely on the provisions of the Mental Health Act as an alternative to remanding them in custody. In some instances, it may be possible to adjourn and ask a social worker or the police to take the defendant to a hospital. In others, it may be possible to grant him bail either on the understanding that he will seek medical treatment or on condition that he resides in hospital for such treatment.

Section 35 of the 1983 Act is also available to magistrates and Crown courts which want reports on the accused's mental condition. This requires the written or oral evidence of a medical practitioner that there is reason to suspect that the defendant is suffering from one of the four categories of mental disorder specified by the Act. The remand may be for 28 days at a time, with a maximum of 12 weeks.

Section 36 of the 1983 Act enables Crown courts to remand an accused person to hospital for treatment on the written or oral evidence of medical practitioners that he is suffering from mental illness or severe mental impairment of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be detained in hospital. The remand may again be for a period of 28 days at a time with a maximum of 12 weeks.

When a defendant who comes within the scope of the Mental Health Act has been convicted of an imprisonable offence, Crown courts and magistrates courts can make a hospital order under section 37 of the Act. Before doing so, they must have written or oral evidence from two medical practitioners that the offender is suffering from one of the four categories of disorder of a nature or degree that makes it appropriate for him to be detained in hospital for medical treatment.

My hon. Friend has emphasised the number of people who are in prison and who, in the view of the prison medical service, are such that they should be detained in hospital for treatment, and she has stated the numbers correctly. The last census in September 1987 showed that 188 remand prisoners and 156 sentenced prisoners fell into that category. The distinction must be made between remand and sentenced prisoners for these purposes. The remand prisoners are generally those who are awaiting assessment by doctors from the special hospitals or from the NHS to arrange for their admission if courts make hospital orders following conviction. I would like to see greater use made by the courts of arrangements such as remands direct to hospital, or of informal arrangements with local hospitals so as to reduce the number of people remanded to prison.

It is inevitable that there will be in prison on remand at any time a number of people who are mentally disordered within the meaning of the Act, and who are susceptible to treatment in hospital, but who, because of the court's order, have to be in prison or on remand pending assessment. I do not find that quite as troubling as the number of sentenced prisoners in prisons.

We must accept that in some cases, especially the more serious ones, remand to prisons, at least initially, cannot be avoided. The prison medical service provides an essential service in liaising with the special hospitals and the NHS to make arrangements for admissions to hospitals either on transfer under section 48 of the Mental Health Act or after conviction.

I hope that the House accepts that the problem of mentally disordered offenders is one which the Government take very seriously. There has been a steady improvement in the facilities available in the special hospitals and in the NHS for people who can be detained in hospital for treatment. The 1983 Act introduced a number of measures designed to avoid the use of custody for mentally disordered people, including the power to remand for reports and treatment under sections 35 and 36 of the Act. It also enables the courts to make guardianship orders or to make interim hospital orders to enable a person's response to treatment to be assessed before the courts make a final decision. The Act has therefore given the courts a great deal of help towards enabling them to get mentally disturbed offenders into hospital care instead of into prison.

We recognise that much more needs to be done and this led us to set up in 1986 the interdepartmental working group, which involved work between the Home Office and the DHSS and, as I have already stated, the Government have accepted the great majority of the substantial recommendations, which we are now putting in place.

My hon. Friend has raised a very serious point, because there are a number—not a huge number—of mentally disordered people in the prison system. Many people suffer from mental handicap of a different kind, but that is a different problem. We are talking about mentally disordered people within the meaning of the Act, and there are too many of those.

The presence of the remand prisoners is probably inevitable, and I am troubled rather more by the presence of the sentenced prisoners. We must identify where it is that either the substantive law or the way that we implement the law is failing to prevent the entry into the prison system of such people. I propose to try with officials and, if necessary, with Ministers to identify such points and discover if there are a range of measures that we could introduce that would reduce the number of such persons in prison. As my hon. Friend has made her interest clear, I will do my utmost to involve her in the work that I should like to see carried forward.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

NATIONAL FINANCE

Third World Debt

1. Mr. Franks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions took place at the Toronto economic summit relating to Third world debt; if there will be an increase in aid to less developed nations; and if he will make a statement.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): An agreement was reached at the economic summit in Toronto last month, along the lines of the initiative that I launched in April last year, to reduce the debt burden of the poorest, most heavily indebted countries, mainly in sub-Saharan Africa, which are following approved economic policies.

Mr. Franks: Does my right hon. Friend accept that Britain's role in securing that agreement was decisive? Will he continue his efforts to ensure that the agreement is implemented as soon as possible?

Mr. Lawson: Yes. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he has said. It has been our persistence, since I launched the initiative in Washington at the interim committee meeting in April last year, which I believe allowed us to get the agreement in Toronto, which is of the first importance for the heavily indebted poorest countries of sub-Saharan Africa. Earlier this week there was a meeting of senior officials, under the aegis of the Paris Club, at which a substantial amount of agreement was reached on the nuts and bolts. I hope that, as my hon. Friend has said, it will not be too long before the agreement can be implemented.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Does the Chancellor recognise that the cost of debt, particularly in Latin America, can be measured directly in jobs lost in this country through lost exports? What steps will he now take to ensure positive action by the richer nations of the world to ease the debt problems of Latin America?

Mr. Lawson: The middle-income debtors of Latin America indeed have substantial debts. It is a great problem, which has been there since 1982. During that time we have had a well-developed debt strategy for dealing with the problems, but it is not just a matter of the International Monetary Fund taking a lead, as it does very valuably, or of the commercial banks rescheduling debts, which they are doing. It is also vitally important for those countries to put their own economic houses in order.

Mr. Lester: I welcome the additional information that my right hon. Friend has been able to give about recent action in the Paris Club. Can he tell how long it will be before its members will be in a position to implement the scheme that his energies have helped to create, and what scale of benefit we may expect to see for those poorest countries?

Mr. Lawson: I pay tribute to the part that my hon. Friend has played in the House in consistently drawing attention to these matters. I cannot tell him how long it will take, but we are going ahead as quickly as possible; and the fact that the special meeting was held at the Paris Club earlier this week is an indication of that.

As for the benefit for the poorest countries, it is difficult to say. It will build up over a period. It could, however, eventually add up to as much as $500 million a year if the countries concerned participate fully in their proper economic adjustment programmes.

Mr. Holland: The Chancellor's debt strategy may well develop, but it is not very athletic. Surely he realises that, as was pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd), up to a quarter of a million jobs have been lost in the export sector in the United Kingdom since 1981 alone because of the Latin American debt crisis.

As for sub-Saharan Africa, why did the Chancellor not respond to the challenge and invitation issued by the new French Government and President Mitterrand to write off one third of the debt of the 20 least developed African countries? Surely he recognises that it is time to act on debt rather than talk. Otherwise, we shall neither resolve the crisis for the countries concerned nor restore British export trade.

Mr. Lawson: I am astonished at the ill-informed nature of the hon. Gentleman's comments. We have done far more in connection with writing-off old aid loans than France. However, I do not want to enter into competition, because the United Kingdom and France have been working very closely together on the initiative on which agreement was reached in Toronto and which was further discussed at the Paris Club this week.

As for unemployment, I am astonished that the hon. Gentleman should mention it without welcoming today's figures, which show that unemployment in this country has fallen by well over half a million since the general election alone.

Sir William Clark: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his welcome initiative. Does he agree, however, that it is the height of irresponsibility to promise a massive increase in aid when, if the Labour party ever regained office, our economy would be in such a parlous state that we would not be able to afford an increase in aid, and might not even be able to afford the aid that we now provide?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. It is very easy for the Opposition to say, as they do, that they will increase aid. The Leader of the Opposition—who at present is safely away from these shores—has said that they will increase it by two and a half times, and raise the basic rate of income tax by 2p to pay for it. But, of course, if there were ever another Labour Government the economy would be in such dire straits that I doubt whether even a 2p increase in income tax would be sufficient to pay for it.

Balance of Payments

2. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current balance of payments position.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Lilley): In the first five months of this year the current account deficit was estimated at £4·7 billion.

Mr. Winnick: Does the Minister admit that the figures for May were absolutely appalling—the worst monthly figures on record for any period? Is not the deficit for the first five months of this year three times the size of that for the whole of 1987, and are not all the indications that the position will worsen? Is this the foundation for what the Chancellor calls our economic recovery?

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Gentleman should recognise that there is all the difference in the world between a country that is running a deficit on its payments when it has a surplus on its public finances, and one that is running a deficit that reflects not the growth of investment domestically but a deficit that its Government are running, as the Labour Government that the hon. Gentleman supported produced for this country.

Mr. Tim Smith: Is it not inevitable, when the latest Department of Trade and Industry intention investment survey projects a 16 per cent. rise in manufacturing investment, that that should be reflected in our import figures? Do not those figures, and the excellent figures from the Department of Employment today, which show that manufacturing productivity is continuing to rise by 6 per cent., offer the best hope for continuing improvement in our competitiveness?

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend is right. The investment boom to which he refers also shows up in the import figures. In the past three months the growth in imports of investment goods was about 19 per cent. and that of consumption goods only about 10 per cent.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Is not the most worrying aspect of the high interest and high exchange rate policy now being pursued, not only that the Chancellor will be the first Chancellor in history to preside over a manufacturing trade deficit in excess of £10 billion, but that the trade deficit is deteriorating sharply in the new industries on which our industrial future depends—computers, information technology and electronics—where it is estimated to be £2 billion alone? Will the Treasury now honour the promise made by the Minister for Trade yesterday in the House to publish the revised forecasts for the balance of payments deficit and publish the forecasts for this year and for next year, or is it too ashamed of the real figures even to do that?

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend has said that he will publish the revised forecasts in the normal way in the Autumn Statement as required under the Industry Act. The hon. Gentleman's presentation of the position of British manufacturing industry is grotesque, particularly in a week when we have heard that Britain has won the largest export order of manufactured goods ever. Clearly, that is not a sign that we are doing badly.

As for the overall picture of gloom and doom painted by the hon. Gentleman, it is clear that he does not really believe that there is a serious problem because the policies that he advocates are precisely those designed to create a real balance of payments problem.

Manufacturing Profitability

3. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the rise in manufacturing profitability in 1987.

6. Mr. Curry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the rise in manufacturing profitability in 1987.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Major): Manufacturing profitability is estimated to have risen by about 1¼ percentage points in 1987 to 8¼ per cent., the highest level since the beginning of the 1970s.

Mr. Hunter: Does my right hon. Friend's answer not highlight one of the many strong features of our economy, as without profitability there can be no expansion through reinvestment, and without that expansion there can be neither the job nor the wealth creation to finance our welfare and social programmes?

Mr. Major: My hon. Friend is entirely correct. The fruits of that success have been shown in expenditure programmes over recent years. In addition, profitability has risen each year since 1981, and that is a most welcome trend.

Mr. Curry: Are not improved industrial relations contributing substantially to improved profitability? Is it not therefore particularly silly and reactionary for the Trades Union Congress to seek to drive out from its ranks those unions willing to conclude single union agreements, to the great benefit of the company for which they work, the real earnings of their own work force and employment?

Mr. Major: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend, but it would be indelicate for me to intrude in the misery of the trade union movement.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that a major threat is posed to manufacturing profitability by the high pound and high interest rates, which are estimated to cost £600 million this year?

Mr. Major: Profitability frequently depends on competitiveness, and competitiveness is best measured by performance. British industry is performing better today than it has done for many years.

Ms. Armstrong: Will the Minister encourage some of that profitability to be reinvested, particularly in research and development? We still have a shocking record of investment in research and development in this country, particularly in the northern region, and we need that research and development to ensure future capacity in manufacturing and in the real economy, which will produce the jobs and the prosperity of the future.

Mr. Major: I have some sympathy with what the hon. Lady says. There is a substantial amount of public sector investment in research and development, and I would welcome increased private sector investment in research and development. I hope that that forms part of the significant investment boom that we are now seeing.

Productivity

4. Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the average annual increase in the productivity of the whole United Kingdom economy since 1980.

Mr. Major: Since 1980 output per head in the whole economy has grown at an average rate of 2¾ per cent. per year, about the same as Japan and faster than any other major industrialised country.

Miss Widdecombe: Will my right hon. Friend tell the House how far the increase in productivity compares with our performance in the 1960s and 1970s and with that of our competitors over those years?

Mr. Major: The improvement in productivity is greater now than at any stage in recent years, including the 1960s. The most effective recent comparative figures are that growth has been averaging 2¾ per cent. per annum since 1980, compared with a growth pattern between 1973 and 1980 of only 0·7 per cent.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Why is the increase in productivity linked to such a massive balance of payments deficit? Is not the problem for the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he cannot leave his job next year? He is locked into his appointment because he is scared stiff of leaving a balance of payments deficit.

Mr. Major: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the ingenuity of his question. I share his wish that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will remain Chancellor for a considerable period. As my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury said, the deficit on the balance of payments and the balance of trade reflects partly a strong growth in domestic activity. It reflects also —this is material to manufacturing—the fact that a great deal of the import growth relates to capital, semi-capital and intermediate goods, which are being imported as part of the investment boom.

Sir John Stokes: Good as the figures are for manufacturing productivity, is my right hon. Friend not a little concerned about the large rise in wage rates? If they continue, they could threaten our economic growth.

Mr. Major: I share my hon. Friend's concern about the rise in wage rates, not least because we wish to see the dramatic reductions in unemployment continue. The rise in wage rates in part reflects overtime earnings and productivity bonuses, and that we welcome.

Imports (Tax Cuts)

5. Mr. Clelland: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the impact of top rate tax cuts on imports.

The Paymaster General (Mr. Peter Brooke): The elimination of the top rates of tax over 40 per cent. will improve economic performance and thus lead to higher living standards all round.

Mr. Clelland: Will the Minister confirm that Britain's balance of trade in cars with West Germany has deteriorated more sharply than any other part of the balance of trade since 1979? Will he also confirm that his £2 billion tax give-away to those on the highest tax rates will find its way into the purchase of BMWs, Audis and Porsches, which will further deteriorate the balance of trade in cars?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman has asked me a rather long question, especially if the terms of it are taken back to 1979. He referred to the current balance of payments deficit. He should realise that the increase in investment goods imported is considerably larger than the increase in consumer goods imported.

Mr. Latham: Less than two years ago imports were lower, the economy was stagnant and in recession and tax rates were much higher. Were the Opposition whingeing then as well?

Mr. Brooke: My hon. Friend is right.

Mr. Chris Smith: Is not personal consumption the highest import content of any economic activity within the economy? If so, why did the Chancellor of the Exchequer decide in his Budget to place such emphasis on top-rate tax cuts? Those cuts will undoubtedly fuel consumption rather than investment in our infrastructure and worsen the already bad balance of payments position. Will the Minister now answer the question that was put to him earlier this afternoon by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown)? Will the balance in manufacturing trade reach a deficit of £10 billion this year?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman's question linked a series of hypotheses. I continue with the observation that I have just made. In terms of the current balance of payments deficit, the increase in investment goods imported is rising much faster than the increase in consumer goods.

Inflation

7. Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of future inflation.

17. Mr. Andrew MacKay: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current level of inflation.

Mr. Lawson: The rate of inflation in May stood at 4·2 per cent.

Mr. Knight: Despite some signs that the economy may be starting to overheat, is my right hon. Friend aware that Conservative Members, and most of the country, have absolute confidence in his ability to keep our economic progress on course? But will he give the House an unequivocal undertaking that in no circumstances will he accept advice from the Labour party, bearing in mind that in August 1975 inflation hit a 20th century peak of 26·9 per cent. under a Labour Government?

Mr. Lawson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his earlier remarks. The annual rate of inflation under Labour in August 1975 of 26·9 per cent. is an interesting figure, because in that one year inflation was more than in the past five years put together. However, I can assure my hon. Friend that I am still not satisfied with the rate of inflation in Britain and, despite the fact that it is only a fraction of what it was under the Labour Government, I am determined that we shall get it down, and our policy will be directed to that end.

Mr. MacKay: As we have been told that today's Cabinet meeting has reached a decision on total public expenditure for the coming years, can my right hon. Friend confirm that the rate of inflation will influence the next expenditure round?

Mr. Lawson: Yes, indeed. My hon. Friend is right. One of the fundamental reasons for Britain's economic success has been our firm control of public expenditure, which has fallen steadily as a share of GDP since 1982-83. In the Cabinet this morning we reaffirmed that strategy and agreed that public expenditure should continue to fall as a share of GDP throughout the next three years.

Mr. Alton: Despite what the Chancellor says about economic success, does he agree that today's Trustee Savings Bank report on the economic indicators in Northern Ireland demonstrates just how patchy that recovery is? For instance, in Northern Ireland last year employment in manufacturing industry fell by 1·3 per cent. and output is only now reaching 1979 limits. Does he agree that the overheated economy in the south-east of England contrasts with those less prosperous regions of the United Kingdom, where unemployment is still the major problem facing the people living there?

Mr. Lawson: I must confess that I have not read the latest TSB report, but the hon. Gentleman is somewhat mistaken. First, on the question of Northern Ireland, as he is well aware, that unhappy Province has particular problems of its own which are not purely economic—indeed, not economic in origin at all—but obviously have a great bearing on the economic performance of the Northern Ireland economy. However, the figures that have been published hitherto for Northern Ireland may have understated the growth of output in the Province. The hon. Gentleman will welcome today's excellent unemployment figures, which show not only a further massive fall for the 23rd month in succession, but that the biggest fall of all has been in the west midlands, the north-west and the north of England.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer explain something that is puzzling many people: why, whenever inflation in goods and services is low he takes credit for it, but when we have a historically high level of inflation in house prices he says that it is due to something else?

Mr. Lawson: I did not know that there had been any discussion today about inflation in house prices. House price inflation is a different matter from general price inflation. [Laughter.] If Opposition Members laugh, that only shows their ignorance. Let them explain how it is that, while inflation in Japan is very close to zero, property prices in Tokyo and Osaka have risen far faster than in London.

Mr. John Townend: Further to my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay) about the current danger of overheating in the economy, will he confirm that the Cabinet today decided not to exceed in 1989-90 the amount laid down for public expenditure in the medium-term financial strategy? Will he confirm that it would be dangerous if public sector wage settlements for the coming year exceeded inflation?

Mr. Lawson: What we agreed was wholly consistent with the pledge in our election manifesto last year. Public expenditure for the coming three years should be kept as close as possible to the planning totals, and public expenditure should continue to fall as a share of GDP throughout the next three years. My hon. Friend is right in saying that that pay settlements, both in the public and the private sector, have a very important bearing on the public expenditure totals, and, indeed, on the performance of the economy.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: May I drag the Chancellor away from the problems of the Japanese housing market and his reminiscences of the last Labour Government to discuss inflation? Does he agree that the largest single pressure on the retail prices index is the 11 per cent. price rise in electricity, the 10 per cent. price rise in water charges, the 12 per cent. price rise in rates and the 6 per cent. overall rise in gas prices? Those are all in the public sector and the Government should take responsibility for them. What will the Government do to curb that sort of inflation?

Mr. Lawson: All the matters that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned are taken into account in the retail price index, which has gone up by 4·2 per cent., according to the latest figure. However, rate increases are the responsibility, not of the Government, but of Socialist councils up and down the country.

Indirect Tax Rates

8. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to approximate indirect tax rates to the European Community average.

Mr. Lilley: No, Sir.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Does my hon. Friend agree that the EEC Commission proposal to harmonise VAT rates throughout the Community is based on the fallacy that different rates distort competition? Will he point out to the Commission that that is not the case, because VAT is a tax on consumers, not on production costs, and that businesses can reclaim VAT? Does my hon. Friend agree that the EEC Commission might find it inconvenient and untidy to have different rates of tax in different parts of the Community, but that that hardly justifies an assault on the tax powers of individual Parliaments?

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right in saying that VAT causes no distortions of commercial trade, because it applies equally to imported and domestic goods, and requires comparatively limited border control. The only distortion is cross-border shopping. The European Commission's proposals to deal with that are rather misconceived. That is perhaps better solved by liberalising controls on cross-border shopping, and then leaving market forces to constrain individual countries through the rates of VAT that they choose to apply.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Will the Minister confirm that all those goods and services that are currently zero-rated will continue to be so rated for the foreseeable future?

Mr. Lilley: I can confirm that the British Government will not allow their powers to retain zero rates to be constrained by the EEC.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Does my hon. Friend agree that the lesson of the United States of America is instructive? In that single market individual states are free to levy their own rates of indirect taxation. The outturn is that market forces are the ultimate constraint on those rates.

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That illustrates that it is quite unnecessary to constrain the sovereign power of individual countries to set their own indirect tax rates. It would be paradoxical if the member states of the European Community had less power in this respect than the individual states of the United States of America.

Dr. Marek: Will the Economic Secretary state here and now that there will be no VAT on transport, books, newspapers and periodicals? If he will not, does he realise that these items will then be the subject of some shabby horse-trading in a smoke-filled room some time in 1992 when the Common market comes to make its compromises?

Mr. Lilley: I have made it absolutely clear already that we shall not concede our right to retain the zero rate on any products on which we already have it.

Economic Output

9. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the growth in economic output during the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lawson: Over the 12 months to the first quarter of 1988 total output grew by 5 per cent.

Mr. Thurnham: I welcome today's fall in unemployment, which marks the longest continuous period of falling unemployment since the war. Does this not provide convincing evidence of the much greater success of this Government's economic policies than any of the policies that were ever adopted by the Opposition?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct when he refers to today's excellent figures for unemployment and employment. He might also have a look at today's figures for manufacturing output, which show that it is some 6½ per cent. up on a year ago and that this is the fastest rising sector of the economy.

Mr. Skinner: Can the Chancellor of the Exchequer explain to the House why it is that, on another economic output front—the invisibles, which in election year were running at £700 million a month—had fallen to £400 million a month in the first three months of 1988? There is a point of view that these figures were fiddled during election year to assist the balance of payments during that year. Will he take into account the fact that if that £400 million continues throughout 1988 it will produce another £2 billion deficit on his balance of payments?

Mr. Lawson: I must say in all seriousness to the hon. Member that the figure for the balance of invisible trade, which is frequently revised in both directions by the Central Statistical Office, is worked out totally independently by that office. He has cast a very serious slur on the Central Statistical Office and the civil servants who work for it, and I hope that he will withdraw it.

Sir Dudley Smith: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the west midlands is working again, producing again and making profits again? Does this not speak volumes for the policies of my right hon. Friend and the Government?

Mr. Lawson: Yes, indeed, and as an east midlands Member I am delighted to see the rapidly growing prosperity of both the east and west midlands. It is one of the most encouraging aspects of the remarkable growth that we have had in this country over the past five years and more that it is now being seen in all parts of the economy.

Interest Rates

10. Mr. John Evans: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost to manufacturing industry of the cumulative rise in interest rates since 1 June.

Mr. Lawson: Bank base rates currently stand at 10 per cent. This is roughly in line with the average level of interest rates during the last five years, during which manufacturing output has increased by over 20 per cent.

Mr. Evans: Does the Chancellor accept the CBI's figures, which show that the five interest rate increases that we have had since 1 June have cost industry about £25 million, that industry is now bearing the brunt of his policies and that in the long term his policies, which might prove beneficial to financiers in the City of London, are proving disastrous for what is left of manufacturing industry in Great Britain?

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Member really is living in a world of his own. If he were to go out into the real world, if he were ever to meet anyone in manufacturing industry, if he were ever to see inside a manufacturing company, he would realise that manufacturing industry is doing better than ever before. Manufacturers know this and acknowledge it.

Mr. Duffy: Given the Chancellor's earlier reference to the Tokyo property market, is he prepared to say that the Prime Minister's insistence on tax encouragement to wealthy people to buy high-priced dwellings, thereby unnecessarily boosting credit, is not bringing his interest rate policy at some point into conflict with non-inflationary growth and jeopardising the investment plans of manufacturing industry at its lower, smaller end?

Mr. Lawson: At the time of the Budget I felt that there was a case for cutting back on the extent of that sort of credit. That is why I removed the multiple mortgage relief for sharers and abolished altogether the relief on home improvement loans. I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman voted for those clauses. I seem to recall that he did not.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Is it not the case that the increased interest cost to manufacturing industry can largely be offset by sensible wage settlements?

Mr. Lawson: Yes, my hon. Friend is right.

Mr. Yeo: Does my right hon. Friend agree that industry is more concerned about the level of inflation than the level of interest rates and that there is widespread recognition of his successful use of interest rates as a means of keeping inflation down?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is something that I have said time and time again. I have shown by my actions that interest rates will be set at whatever level is necessary to bear down on inflation.

Currency

11. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent assessment he has made of the popularity of the various coins and bank notes in current usage.

Mr. Brooke: The Government recently reviewed the United Kingdom coinage following a successful public consultation. The most popular option included smaller 5p and 10p coins, which will be introduced in the early 1990s. The Bank of England is responsible for the note issue, which it keeps under careful review.

Mr. Canavan: Can the Minister tell us one other country in the world, apart from England, whose lowest value bank note is as high as £5 sterling or equivalent? If the Bank of England is so insensitive to public opinion that it refuses to give people a choice between a pound note and a pound coin, why not make Scottish bank notes legal tender throughout the United Kingdom instead of forcing people to use unwieldy pound coins which are so heavy, so thick and so unpopular that they remind me of a certain person on the Treasury Bench?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman has made much more pithily the speech that he made on 8 July 1986 in proposing his Bill about the Scottish pound note. His abbreviation today was admirable.

Overseas Assets

12. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the latest figures for the stock of United Kingdom net overseas assets both in value and as a percentage of gross domestic product.

Mr. Major: The United Kingdom's net overseas assets were estimated at some £90 billion at end-1987, about 21 per cent. of gross domestic product.

Mr. Arnold: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the figures are an excellent measure of the restoration of the economic strength of Britain in the world? Would he care to comment on the effect that the return on those investments has on the British economy at present?

Mr. Major: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend's first point. On the second point, those overseas investments brought in nearly £6 billion in annual income in 1987, the highest level ever recorded. The returns from the first quarter of 1988 suggest a similar return this year.

Third World Debt

14. Miss Lestor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the Japanese Government's proposals at the Toronto summit to, in effect, turn part of the commercial bank debt into Government bonds and to ease the amount of debt payments.

Mr. Lilley: These complex proposals were not discussed at Toronto and still need to be clarified.

Miss Lestor: Bearing in mind that, as a proportion of GNP, aid from Britain to the Third world is now at its lowest ebb, debt becomes an important part of easing the burden of those countries. Also bearing in mind that the Japanese proposals relate particularly to middle-income countries, where malnutrition is rising and whose incomes are falling, could not the Chancellor be persuaded to look more closely at the Japanese proposals, which have a contribution to make?

Mr. Lilley: I would have hoped that the hon. Lady, who takes a great interest in these matters, would pay tribute to my right hon. Friend's success, through his dogged persistence, in achieving agreement at Toronto on the initiative to help the sub-Saharan African countries, which is a major and important priority. We shall, of course, consider in detail any proposals that the Japanese put to us. As we see in the hon. Lady's question, she has misinterpreted what the proposals probably are.

Privatisation

15. Mr. Darling: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his current estimate of Treasury receipts from sales of public assets in 1988-89, 1989-90, 1990-91 and 1991-92, respectively.

Mr. Brooke: The latest estimate of privatisation proceeds is shown in the Government's public expenditure White Paper.

Mr. Darling: Has the Chancellor made an assessment of the likely price for the electricity industry if it is sold off, and has he made any assessment of the amount that is likely to be bought by foreign interests rather than by people living in this country?

Mr. Brooke: The public expenditure White Paper estimated proceeds, to which I referred, cover a period of years. The programme which will follow hereafter will undoubtedly sustain those estimates.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having meetings later today.

Mr. Tredinnick: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is remarkable that Mr. Gorbachev should look to her and to a Conservative Administration rather than to a Socialist Administration for ideas and inspiration? Does she further agree that, whereas the Russians were delighted to stop jamming so that millions could hear her across Russia, they are most unlikely to do the same for the Leader of the Opposition?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. I think that the Soviet people wish to hear about successful policies. They want to get away from failed Socialism.

Mr. Hattersley: Will the Prime Minister give a categorical assurance that every regional health authority will receive sufficient additional Government funds to meet the cost of the nurses' pay award and the regrading which she promised to finance in full?

The Prime Minister: The Government have made available £566 million additional to the extra amount of £237 million already in the forecast for the nurses' pay award this year. This includes the whole of the estimated cost of the clinical grading exercise put forward by the Nurses' Pay Review Body.

Mr. Hattersley: The Prime Minister must try to grasp the question, because she has chosen to answer one which I did not ask. So I ask her again: will every regional health authority be given sufficient additional funds to meet the cost of the new pay bill, because five of them understand that they will be left short in October? Yes, or no.

The Prime Minister: The amount that has been made available was the amount that was estimated by the Nurses' Pay Review Body. That full amount has been put forward [Interruption.] The formula used for estimating the total sum required was agreed between representatives of National Health Service chairmen and the review body. That amount is intended to be the amount which they said regrading of the structure would cost.

Mr. Hattersley: The sum was not agreed, but the Prime Minister's error of fact is not the matter at issue. The issue is that unless every regional health authority can be sure of its ability to meet the increased pay bill there will be closed wards and bed cuts—five authorities say that. Does the Prime Minister not understand that, or does the Cabinet, insulated by private medical care, not care what happens in the Health Service?

The Prime Minister: No, £803 million was the figure estimated not by the Government but by the Nurses' Pay Review Body. [Interruption.] Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman, instead of trying to make trouble— [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Prime Minister: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would first read the letter of 13 July 1988 from Mr. Trevor Clay—[HON. MEMBERS: "Read it."] I shall gladly read it out, but I thought that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition might be able to read it for himself. Mr. Clay said:

"There are many problems at local level. But some managements are succeeding in some districts. Why can't others make the same speed?"

Secondly, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will remember that it was his Government who cut nurses' pay, whereas this Government have increased it. He is the cutter of nurses' pay.

Mr. Batiste: What hope can my right hon. Friend offer to the many air travellers stranded at British airports that their plight, caused by air traffic control problems over Europe, will not get progressively worse in the years to come? What initiative can the British Government take with their European partners to provide a long-term solution to the problem?

The Prime Minister: We shall certainly have a look at that. My hon. Friend asked about our air traffic control. As he is aware, we have been trying to get the very latest computers, which should be sufficient and well able to cope with the increase in air traffic control needs. We shall have a look at the co-operation, which I am sure our air traffic controllers have, and need to have, with other air traffic control authorities.

Q2. Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Kennedy: Does the Prime Minister concur that those Conservative Back Benchers who voted against the European Communities (Finance) Bill earlier this week in all likelihood share her gut instinct? Given that she seems to occupy an increasingly ambivalent position at home, and an increasingly isolated position within the Community on greater financial integration, will she concede that the net outcome is likely to be final confirmation of Frankfurt and the Bundestag as the sole financial centre of Europe, to the long-term loss of our country?

The Prime Minister: I would reply to that by saying that my position is direct at home and direct in Europe, and both are to the advantage of Britain.

Q3. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Bellingham: In the course of her busy day, will my right hon. Friend plan a visit to west Norfolk? If she comes to west Norfolk she will be told that today's excellent unemployment figures are reflected locally. Since 1983 unemployment has fallen by half to 7·5 per cent., and since 1979 expenditure on the local health authority has increased by a staggering 60 per cent. in real terms. Is that not a classic case of wealth creation benefiting the whole community?

The Prime Minister: Yes. The record has been excellent. Since the last election unemployment has fallen by half a million. The increase in employment goes on apace. The increase in prosperity also proceeds apace, and it is due to the excellent policies pursued by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—policies which must continue into the future and which benefit the whole country.

Mr. Home Robertson: Has the Prime Minister read the report of the Scottish constitutional steering committee entitled, "A Claim of Right for Scotland"? Is she yet aware of the strain that her Administration are placing on the unity of the United Kingdom, and are there any circumstances in which she would be prepared to take account of our national status and the wishes of the people of Scotland?

The Prime Minister: Scotland has its own national status and always will. That has never been in doubt, since the very Union between Scotland and this country. I have not read the report, but I doubt very much whether either the hon. Gentleman or the Labour party wishes Scotland to separate from England.

Q4. Mr. Cran: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cran: Is my right hon. Friend aware that in the latest seven years for which statistics exist GDP grew in the north of England at the rate of 90 per cent. per head of the population, which was above the British average, and that the figure for Yorkshire and Humberside was 89 per cent., which was the British average? Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to announce her intention to improve on that in the coming years, and to improve the prosperity of every region in the United Kingdom, which is undoubtedly the case at the minute?

The Prime Minister: The figures given by my hon. Friend are excellent, but then the record for the whole country is excellent as the new prosperity spreads over every region. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has provided a firm basis of prosperity that will continue and stretch long into the future.

Q5. Mr. Boyes: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Boyes: Does not the proposed privatisation of the water industry make nonsense of the arguments used on the Conservative Benches that privatisation leads to greater competition among suppliers and greater choice for consumers? When the right hon. Lady turns on a tap in the morning, does she have a choice of supplier, and where is the competition?

The Prime Minister: Many water companies are already in private hands. There is nothing new about water being in private hands, as the hon. Gentleman would know if he knew history.

Mr. Conway: During the course of my right hon. Friend's busy day, will she reflect on the fact that home ownership has grown substantially during her premiership, and that that growth could not have occurred without her protection of mortgage interest rate relief? Will she assure the House that that relief will not be tampered with and that the Government do not intend to introduce a property tax of any kind?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that we would not have seen the enormous extension of home ownership without mortgage interest tax relief. I am a great believer in it. As my hon. Friend knows, I get very cross if anybody wants to stop it, when they themselves got their foot on the first rung of the ladder by making use of that very relief. So long as I am here, it will continue.

Q6. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Salmond: Can the Prime Minister explain to the House why, if no decision has been made about the hot strip mill at Ravenscraig, Sir Robert Scholey should be publicly writing its obituary? Will she undertake to visit the Ravenscraig complex, to meet the shop stewards and a representative selection of Scottish opinion, and to hear at first hand why the closure and dismemberment of the Ravenscraig plant is not acceptable to the Scottish nation?

The Prime Minister: I answered an almost identical question last Tuesday, except that I was not asked to visit Ravenscraig. I doubt very much whether I can take up that kind invitation immediately. The position was made clear by my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Trade and Industry when he answered a parliamentary question last December concerning the future of Ravenscraig, privatisation and the difficulty with hot strip mills, where there is at the moment a surplus of capacity. We do not know what will be the position following the abolition of European steel quotas. When we do, we shall know precisely whether hot strip mill capacity will be in excess of demand and whether some mills may have to be closed.

Q7. Mr. Marlow: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Marlow: May I ask my right hon. Friend what responsibility she has for British citizens overseas? I give as an example a pair of innocents abroad—a short, red-headed Welshman and his wilful wife—who, no doubt tanked up on South African wine, have offered to give £1,500 million of British taxpayers' money to their hosts each year.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will relate his question to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Marlow: Is that something that we ought to ignore, or should we think about taking away their passports?

The Prime Minister: I thought that my hon. Friend started off his question by asking about overseas aid, but it was a little difficult to hear. Is that correct?

Mr. Marlow indicated assent.

The Prime Minister: The overseas aid record of this Government is extremely good, not only in terms of direct aid, but in terms of the massive amount of investment that has gone overseas from the private sector. I agree that to increase it enormously, as has been proposed, would put a great deal of burden on our people. I also commend the excellent initiative taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to cancel some of the aid loans, which has now been taken up by the Toronto summit. I hope that my hon. Friend heard more of my reply than I did of his question.

Q8. Mr. Madden: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Madden: Will the Prime Minister break the habit of a lifetime and give a straight answer to a straight question that has been put to her four times? Will the Government fund fully the pay award and the regrading exercise for our nurses? Does she understand that nurses in every constituency do not regard concern about their pay as troublemaking? They are much more concerned with Government treachery. That is what will be committed if the Prime Minister now says that the Government will not fund fully the pay award to the nursing professon.

Hon. Members: Yes or no?

The Prime Minister: The amount necessary to fund that award in full is £803 million. That was not calculated by the Government, it was calculated by the Nurses' Pay Review Body. It is intended to fund it in full—[HON. MEMBERS: "Yes or no?]—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We do not have the chanting of that sort of thing here.

The Prime Minister: Most nurses in the United Kingdom rejoice at the £803 million, compared with the cut, cut, cut that they had under Labour.

Cervical Cancer Screening (Christie Hospital)

3.31 pm

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington) (by private notice): To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the errors found in the cervical screening tests performed at the laboratories at Christie hospital in Withington, Manchester.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): The Christie hospital in Manchester processes some 250,000 cervical smears per year. I understand that it undertakes work for several health authorities, including North Staffordshire.

As a result of a routine check, some doubts were expressed about 60 slides that are now being checked by independent advisers from other regions. I understand that part of the problem relates to the process by which the slides were made, which has made them somewhat difficult to interpret.

I am satisfied that appropriate action has been taken promptly. All the slides were taken quite recently and all the clinicians concerned were notified at once. Where appropriate, repeat smears have been, or are being, taken.

We have complete confidence in the Christie, which has an international reputation in this area.

Mr. Bradley: I am grateful for the answer that the Minister—the junior Minister—has given.

I should like to praise the Christie hospital, which is based in my constituency of Withington, as it is a centre of excellence and I believe that it is one of the best-run laboratories in this country undertaking cervical screening. I have particular praise for Dr. Yule and his staff who have worked under tremendous pressure during the past few years when the financial resources to the South Manchester health authority have been extremely limited.

When the errors—as they have been called—which were identified came to light in north Staffordshire, why were Dr. Yule and his staff not informed of that fact? No discussion has taken place between the Christie laboratories and north Staffordshire about the differences that have been found.

The Labour party welcomes the extension of cervical screening—we have been pressing for that for a number of years—and the regular call and recall of women. It is absolutely essential that resources are made available to ensure that there is reliability and a high standard of staff within the laboratories such as the Christie laboratories. Such reliability should continue, not only in public laboratories such as Christie's, but in the private laboratories to ensure that proper procedures and reliability are maintained. Finally—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a question, not a statement. I appeal to the hon. Member to be brief.

Mr. Bradley: Briefly, when will the Government recognise the pay and conditions of the laboratory staff and ensure that they are adequately funded, trained and maintained in the public sector of public health?

Mrs. Currie: As the hon. Gentleman may well know, since January this year, when a circular was sent out from my Department, all laboratories taking part in the cervical cancer screening system are required to have external policy assessment systems. The standard practice is to do a quality check on one in 10 smears. At the Christie the staff routinely read one in seven. Therefore, their checking procedures, which are of the utmost vigour, set higher standards than are routinely required. The normal practice where there is a dispute between clinicians, as there is in this case, is to call in a third party, and that is precisely what we have done. We wait to see exactly what they will recommend to us, if anything.

The hon. Gentleman may well know that the MLSO training scheme has not until now included specific training for cervical cytology, but it is under consideration. We are keen to standardise both training and qualifications in this area. I am satisfied that it has not been a question of resources but of how the slides were prepared and whether there is any genuine dispute about the results that they might or might not show.

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): Is my hon. Friend aware that her tribute to the excellence of the Christie hospital will be much appreciated by my constituents and people throughout the north-west of England? Will she confirm that the Christie hospital conducts more cervical screening than any other hospital or centre in the country? Is not the suggestion that the specific smears, which have been alluded to as being faulty, were apparently sub-standard, of concern? Was that due to human failure or the failure to provide the correct, most modern equipment for the smears to be taken? As the Christie hospital draws 95 per cent. or more of its patients from outside the South Manchester health authority area, will she seriously consider putting it on the same basis as the Royal Marsden in London, which is its own health district?

Mrs. Currie: It would probably be premature of me to comment on what went on, if anything, in the terms my hon. Friend suggests. The Christie does 250,000 smears a year out of a national total of 4 million. Therefore, it is a major part of our screening programme, as my hon. Friend said, although many of those smears come, not through the screening programme, but through work done on patients who have other conditions. I am sure that my hon. Friend would agree that the woman in danger is the woman who has never had a smear. It continues to be true in Manchester, as in the rest of the country, that the majority of deaths occur in woman who have never been tested.

Several Hon. Members rose

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appeal for brief questions.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): My hon. Friend announced that cross-checks have been taken in respect of women who have had smears in north Staffordshire. Can she confirm that cross-checks will be made on samples taken elsewhere, particularly in the north-west, including my constituency of Stockport?

Mrs. Currie: Yes, this is standard practice and we expect first-class internal and external quality control systems to be implemented. I have no information that that is not the case.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Does the Minister accept that she is wrong when she tells the House that the woman in danger is the woman sho has not had a test? The woman who has had a wrongly diagnosed test is in considerable danger. Can she satisfy the House that this cluster of samples which showed problems is a one-off and has no implications for any other district? As the Minister said, many district health authorities use the good facilities at Christie, but we want to ensure that if mistakes have been made in north Staffordshire, they have not been made anywhere else.

Mrs. Currie: Yes, I am satisfied that this is an unusual incident that deserves the full investigation that it is receiving. I repeat what I said earlier: the women who are in danger are those who have never been tested. Most deaths in this country from cervical cancer among our women are those of women who have never had a smear test. I notice that the lady Members in the House are nodding as I say that.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): In view of this morning's press report that the Christie has taken work from large numbers of other authorities, including St. Helens, will the Minister undertake to return to the House with a full statement once she has concluded her investigations? Obviously, a number of women up and down the counry must be worried.

Mrs. Currie: I am satisfied that it is entirely right that the outstanding work at the Christie, which is one of the world's greatest cancer hospitals, with first-class laboratories, should be available to a large number of health authorities. The hospital also acts as assessor for other authorities, which is entirely right and proper. I am satisfied that this batch of 60 slides, which come from one part of the country and whose problems may be due to the way in which the slides were prepared and not so much to the way in which they were read, is being properly investigated and any cause for concern is being alleviated.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): The situation on Merseyside should again exercise the mind of the Minister. If such things happen they will obviously undermine women's confidence in the service, and the women the Minister mentioned who have not had a smear may not trust the system. Should she not be seriously concerned to ensure that there is no recurrence of this sort of thing?

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Gentleman will know of the efforts that my Department made to ensure that the problems in Liverpool were dealt with as promptly as possible once we had been alerted to them. We have learnt the lesson from Liverpool. In part, it was that there was no clear internal or external quality control system. In this case, quality control systems have picked up problems extremely quickly. All the smears that are the subject of dispute were taken within the past few weeks and all the clinicians concerned have been contacted.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): Sadly, cases of this sort will continue as long as we have cytological methods that are slow and up to 40 per cent. inaccurate, and which examine only normal looking cells. Will my hon. Friend do all that she possibly can to divert more resources into research relating to automation and accuracy?

Mrs. Currie: Yes, we are as interested as my hon. Friend in eventually getting some form of automation, especially as we are dealing with 4 million smears a year. I was pleased to note at a recent scientific meeting in the Department that about 13 different proposals were presented to us, some of which looked promising. Getting it right is a slow business; for the time being we shall continue to rely on the excellent people who work in our laboratories.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): I want to take up the point the Minister made about the women who have not had the test being at greatest risk. Is she satisfied that there is enough expenditure on promotions to encourage women to have the test? Will she assure the House that if there are greater financial needs at Christie hospital and similar hospitals she will ensure that the funding is available to expand the service?

Mrs. Currie: The work in Manchester in particular suggests that one of the key problems in getting people to respond is that the FPC registers are not always accurate. Sometimes that is because the names and addresses of the women concerned have changed and they have not notified their GPs. I met the Manchester family practitioners committee recently. It is taking vigorous steps to update its FPC registers, so we hope that some of the problems will diminish in future.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): Will the Minister ensure that when there is a difference between two health districts about the accuracy of smears her Department is called in at an early stage to provide independent assessment? Does she accept the proposal of the Institute of Medical Laboratory Sciences that there should be annual proficiency checks for all cervical cancer screeners as part of a national quality control programme in our laboratories?

Although the Government have numerous procedures for measuring the cost of laboratory services, is it not true that they have no national procedures for monitoring their quality? Will she use national television advertising to give women the confidence to go for a smear test, and will she set up quality control to justify that confidence? Does she accept that there are more likely to be further doubts about the quality of the screening programme in view of the cuts and closures of family planning clinics and the collapsing morale of underpaid laboratory staff? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a private notice question.

Mrs. Currie: In answer to the hon. Lady's first question —and I am sure that she would like to hear the answer —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. These are indeed very serious matters. Let us listen to the answers.

Mrs. Currie: In answer to the hon. Lady's first question, my Department does not itself provide independent assessment. What happens is that the departments that are in dispute are required to call in third party assessment, and that is what they have done from two different regions.

In answer to the second question, we are interested in annual checks on staff proficiency, and we are working together with the profession to see whether it can be introduced. In answer to the third point, that there are no national procedures, let me gently recommend the hon. Lady to go to the Library and read the circular that I issued in January this year. The reference number is HC(88)1. She will find that the procedures are contained in it. /Interruption./ If the hon. Lady has not read it, I am not surprised that she does not know about it.

In answer to the question about television advertising, as 4 million smears are being taken every year it is probably now unnecessary to organise a campaign of that kind. In answer to the last two questions, I do not think there is any reason for doubts of the kind that the hon. Lady has expressed. Opposition Members have called for 20 years for the cervical cancer screening programme to be brought in. We have now done that, and I am satisfied that it will save many lives in future.

Business of the House

3.46 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 18 JULY—Supplemental timetable motion on the Education Reform Bill.

Consideration of Lords amendments to the Education Reform Bill (1st Allotted Day).

TUESDAY 19 JULY—Consideration of Lords amendments to the Education Reform Bill (2nd Allotted Day).

Motions relating to the Housing Benefit, The Family Credit and the Income Support (General) No. 2 Amendment Regulations.

WEDNESDAY 20 JULY—Supplemental timetable motion on the Local Government Finance Bill.

Consideration of Lords amendments to the Local Government Finance Bill.

Motion on the code of recommended practice on local authority publicity.

THURSDAY 21 JULY—Estimates Day (3rd Allotted Day). There will be debates on hospital and community health and other services, England (class XIV, vote 1) and on the Training Commission (class VII, vote 5) so far as it relates to adult employment and youth training.

Motion on the British Shipbuilders Borrowing Powers (Increase of Limit) Order.

Motion on the Church of England (Pensions) Measure.

At Ten o'clock the Question will be put on all outstanding estimates.

FRIDAY 22 JULY—There will be a debate on the White paper "Reform of Section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911" (Cm. 408) on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

MONDAY 25 JULY—Remaining stages of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Bill /Lords/.

The House may be asked to consider any Lords amendments which may be received. The House will also wish to know that, subject to the progress of business, it will be proposed that the House should rise for the summer Adjournment on Friday 29 July until Wednesday 19 October.

Mr. Dobson: It is customary to thank the Leader of the House for his business statement, but I would be a hypocrite if I thanked him for what he has told us today.

Before I deal with the business set down for next week, may I ask the Leader of the House to tell us when we are likely to get the next statement on the Rover fiasco? The work force at least is entitled to find out as soon as possible what its future is to be.

From the proposed business for next week, it is clear that we have now reached the ridiculous stage where the Government's legislative business is being organised and master minded by the same people who are organising flight departures at Gatwick airport. It is proposed that on Monday and Tuesday we are to have guillotined debates on the Lords amendments to the Education Reform Bill. The Lords have made, in case the yobboes on the Government Benches have not noticed——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Moderation in language is the rule here.

Mr. Dobson: They are honourable yobboes.

The Lords have made more than 569 amendments to the Education Reform Bill. The amendments cover no fewer than 97 pages and a wide variety of important issues, including parents' ballots, academic freedom, the funding of universities, including those in Scotland, and, particularly, the vexed and delicate topic of religious education and religious services in schools.

The proposed time to be made available to debate all those issues works out at about 80 seconds per amendment —not enough time to read them out, let alone debate and consider them. The Government proclaimed tht the Education Reform Bill was a matter of the utmost importance, but the timetable proposed for next week shows that they intend to treat the Bill, the House of Commons and the nation's children with contempt. I remind Conservative Members that, if the Bill is as important to the future of our children's education as Ministers claim, there are no action replays of childhood. The House must get things right, but there is no chance of getting them right as things stand at present.

On Wednesday, we are expected to debate the Lords amendments to the poll tax Bill. The Lords have made at least 482 amendments—that was the latest count—to that flagship of the Government's legislative programme. The time proposed to be made available to debate the amendments is equivalent to about 60 seconds per amendment.

Both those Bills have been changed almost beyond recognition by the Lords, yet scarcely any time is provided for this elected House to scrutinise the Bills. I say to the Leader of the House, Ministers and Conservative Members that, if they do not make more time available to debate those measures, these will not be Acts of Parliament; they will be little more than ministerial directives, unconsidered by the elected part of this Parliament.

Will the Leader of the House reconsider his proposals? Will he give those people affected by the changes in the Lords the opportunity to advise hon. Members about what they think of the changes that have been made and then bring the Bills back and provide time to debate them properly? We hear a lot of cant from time to time about the need to sustain parliamentary democracy, and Conservative members should remember that, on all occasions, Opposition Members have sustained that position.

The biggest threat to parliamentary democracy is when Governments treat democracy with contempt. That is what we face now, and we call upon the Leader of the House to reconsider the proposals and come back with something sensible that can be sustained.

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) asked me first about the Rover company. I do not think that there is anything useful that I can say at the moment, but the Government certainly intend to keep the House informed in the appropriate way. We can discuss the matter through the usual channels.

The hon. Gentleman raised the question of the Education Reform Bill and, in particular, four issues that he said were extremely important. The amendments to the Bill are available in the Vote Office. I intend to table the timetable motion later today. I believe that the time allocated for consideration of the Lords amendments will prove to be adequate. In view of what the hon. Gentleman has said, I am prepared to have the matter examined again through the usual channels.

I believe that a full day's debate on the Lords amendments to the Local Government Finance Bill will prove to be adequate. I listened to what the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras said and I am prepared to examine the matter again through the usual channels.

Some of the more general remarks of the hon. Member were a bit rich. I reject his criticisms. We shall complete our consideration of the Finance Bill this evening, and I have announced the concluding stages of three major Bills and the proposal that we rise for the summer recess before the end of July. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that that points to disarray in the Government's business programme, he must be thankful that he was not here to see the legislative programme of the last Labour Government.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): To take up my right hon. Friend's welcome response to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), will he bear in mind that Conservative Members would like to debate the Education Reform Bill and the Local Government Finance Bill in some detail and with some seriousness? Will he consider devoting all of next week to the Education Reform Bill, leaving the Local Government Finance Bill until we return in October? Many of us would be perfectly happy to consider the Bills in August as well. I know that my right hon. Friend accepts that these are matters that deserve the most careful and earnest consideration. I hope, therefore, that he will think again.

Mr. Wakeham: I have said to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras that I shall consider these matters again. I have not yet given an undertaking that I can make any changes. I accept that there are a great many amendments to both Bills, but most of them are technical and drafting. A further significant number arise from concessions and commitments which were made during the Bill's passage.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Does the Leader of the House agree that much time could be saved in debating the Lords amendments to both the Education Reform Bill and the Local Government Finance Bill if the Government were prepared to accept many of the sensible amendments that were won in another place, not least those relating to academic freedom and exemption for student nurses, which were tabled and moved by my noble Friends? Can the right hon. Gentleman give any hope that these amendments will be accepted? Various concessions have led to some amendments to the Local Government Finance Bill. They do not make it a good Bill, but if they are accepted it will be less bad. What arrangements are being made to extend the concessions to Scottish legislation?

Mr. Wakeham: The substance of the Bill will have to await the debate. The Government have examined carefully all the issues raised in debate and have accepted a number of suggestions from Opposition parties and from their own supporters. We recognise that in some respects the Bills have been improved. We are grateful to all concerned for their contributions. We are criticised, however, for making concessions when it comes to bringing legislation forward from another place.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Will my right hon. Friend confirm the rule that those who are paid under the Ministerial and Other Salaries Act should not normally absent themselves abroad while the House is sitting? Does he expect next week's business to be attended by the Leader of the Opposition? Does the accept that his safari is strictly necessary?

Mr. Wakeham: I have enough problems on my hands without worrying about the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): Is the Leader of the House aware that he does his reputation no good when he boasts that he has announced the final consideration of two Bills and that the Government are managing the business properly, when he could not do that if he had not announced that the Bills were to be guillotined in the first place?

We and the country understand that the Cabinet consists of Members of Parliament and Members of the other place, but it is clear from the right hon. Gentleman's statement that there is not one parliamentarian among them. Why does he seek to undermine Members of Parliament, which is the effect of his statement? We are expected to say to our constituents, "Obey the laws that have been passed in a freely elected Parliament," when those laws have not been discussed? I cannot say to my constituents, "You must obey this law because it was debated. We lost the vote but it was debated."

It is unacceptable that we should be asked to deal with 500 amendments in one day on the poll tax Bill. It does not matter that all bar two of the amendments were tabled by the Government. We are entitled to discuss Government amendments. We know that—[Interruption.]—every one of those Government amendments in the other place was requested in the House of Commons in Committee and on Report and we are entitled to a proper and full explanation of why the Government have now amended the Bill in the other place—a Bill that they said could not be amended in the other place because it was a taxation matter.

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that the hon. Gentleman's comments are not entirely connected with the business for next week.

Mr. Rooker: Yes they are.

Mr. Wakeham: However, I appreciate that a great deal of business is set down for next week and I have said that I am ready to have discussions through the usual channels. But the hon. Gentleman will recall that on previous occasions the House has considered a large number of Lords amendments on a reasonable time scale. For example, in 1986, just over 580 Lords amendments to the Financial Services Bill were dealt with in just under eight hours.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, if the House is to have any regard to the statements made this afternoon by the hon. Members for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) and for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), the absence of the well-paid Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition is an outrage? Will he make arrangements to bring him back from looking at the one-party state of Zambia and the failed Marxist economy of Mozambique in order to participate in the important work of next week?

Mr. Wakeham: As I have said, I am not responsible for the Leader of the Opposition's travel arrangements. I have announced what I believe to be reasonable business for next week, and I have said that I shall look at it again in view of the request of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras. However, I must point out that, while both Bills came under a guillotine motion, passed by the House, both allowed a considerable amount of time for discussion.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Will the Leader of the House bear in mind that on several occasions we have asked when legislation would be brought forward to restore democracy in Northern Ireland and on several occasions he has told us that discussions are going on? In the light of the impending end of term and the pressure of next week's business, and the reported comments of the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic that it is impossible to maintain a proper and civilised relationship with the United Kingdom, may we have a statement in the near future on when Northern Ireland, as part of the United Kingdom, will obtain proper democracy?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the anxiety about that matter. However, any changes in that system would best be considered against the background of the wider progress of Northern Ireland affairs. I intend to invite the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) to see me for a chat about those matters before the House rises. I cannot promise early progress, but I should very much like to hear his views.

Mr. Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): As my right hon. Friend has announced the dates for the summer recess, will he update us on the televising of Parliament? What progress is being made by the Committee that is considering the matter? Will its report be debated in the House? Without giving actual dates, can he give us some idea of when the experiment will start?

Mr. Wakeham: The Select Committee is making good progress and is working hard. I cannot give my hon. Friend any guidance on the date that its report will be published except to say that it will not be before the House rises for the summer. The House will have an opportunity to debate and make a decision on the report before the experiment is approved and takes place.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): May I press the Leader of the House further on the question of a debate on the future of Rover, particularly in view of yesterday's statement from the European Commission referring to the Rover Group's move from mass car production to specialist car production, a move that has never been debated in the House, which has enormous implications—even the buffoons on the Conservative Benches should listen to this—for the west midlands car components industry? Are those matters to be left solely to the decisions of Mr. Peter Sutherland and Lord Young, neither of whom is answerable to the House?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman, as a fair man, will recognise that we have had several debates on Rover and the substance of what was said in them is a matter not for me but for those taking part. I have said that I recognise that this is an important matter. The Government wish to keep the House informed of any developments, and I shall arrange for that to be done through the usual channels. That is the best way to proceed.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): If my right hon. Friend, as a result of his discussions through the usual channels on next week's crowded business, needs to find a little more parliamentary time, may I suggest that he considers postponing Friday's debate on the reform of the Official Secrets Act until the spill-over period? Is he aware that it seems a little over-secretive to be debating the reform of official secrecy in the dog watches of a July Friday when there is much interest in the matter which would benefit from further consideration of the recently published White Paper in prime parliamentary time?

Mr. Wakeham: Many of us find that we are in the House on Fridays and we are talking about a normal Friday. I recognise that for some people Friday is not the most convenient day, but I arranged the debate because the Government undertook to do so. Obviously, if there was a general wish to change it, I would consider that, but I believe that it is best to proceed as I announced.

Ms. Dawn Primarolo (Bristol, South): Will the Leader of the House arrange for a statement to be made to the House on the current situation in Nicaragua—[Interruption.] Conservative Members may find this funny, but people are dying in Nicaragua and it is not a funny subject—particularly in the light of the actions of the Americans in the last few weeks, and bearing in mind that the American Senate is considering an amendment to reinstitute lethal aid to the Contra terrorists to institute violence, destabilisation and attacks on a young democracy. We as a democracy should be stating clearly our revulsion towards those activities and pressurising the Americans, through the House, to back off and leave Nicaragua alone.

Mr. Wakeham: I cannot promise the hon. Lady a debate on that subject next week, but there are ways in which she may be able to raise it. I have seen the early-day motion on the subject in her name, but I have to tell her that the Government deplore that motion, which seeks to justify actions by the Sandinista Government which are in clear contravention of their commitment to the democratisation embodied in the Guatemala peace agreement.

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): Last Monday evening, when the Foreign Secretary appeared on television on "Wogan", the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland also appeared on television when he said that, in effect, it was vital that he should stay on an extra year in that office in order to bring his political initiatives to a successful conclusion. The people of Northern Ireland are mystified because they are not aware of any political initiative that would require the Secretary of State to stay on for another year to bring it to a conclusion. Therefore, may we have an urgent debate next week so that the Secretary of State can reveal to the elected representatives of Northern Ireland and to its people, who have been treated like a second-rate colony, this mystical so-called political initiative? The democracy that is so essential for Northern Ireland's progress might then be restored.

Mr. Wakeham: I regret that I cannot find time for a debate on Northern Ireland next week. I also regret that I do not have time to watch the television programme, whose name I have forgotten, that the hon. Gentleman saw last week. However, I wonder whether he has paraphrased exactly what my right hon. Friend said. My right hon. Friend is an excellent Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, and the longer he stays the better. However, if my right hon. Friend thinks that he can complete the task of solving the problems of Northern Ireland in one year, he is more of an optimist than I suspect he really is.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appeal to hon. Members to ask questions about next week's business and not to make general comments.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Has the Leader of the House had an opportunity to study the "A Claim of Right for Scotland" document produced yesterday by the campaign for the Scottish Assembly? Do the Government intend to make a statement on that document and explain for how long they will continue to ignore the overwhelming majority opinion in Scotland in favour of constitutional change?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman makes claims for his authority to speak for opinion in Scotland which I do not recognise in election results. I have not studied the document that he referred to, but if he sends me a copy I will look at it.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): I hope that my right hon. Friend will join me in deploring some of the mischief-making by Conservative Members about the absence of the Leader of the Opposition while he is visiting black dictators in South Africa when he should be in the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member should ask about the business for next week.

Mr. Hamilton: Would it be in order for my right hon. Friend to authorise a debate next week on the value to this country of the Leader of the Opposition being abroad as often as possible, because confidence in Britain will inevitably grow the more he demonstrates to foreigners why the Labour party is unelectable?

Mr. Wakeham: I am quite sure that I could get such a motion in order, but I have no intention of trying.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I repeat that business questions are supposed to be about business next week, not about scoring political points.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): As it is Nelson Mandela's 70th birthday on Monday—Opposition Members honour his memory and would wish for a Government statement on the subject—is the Leader of the House aware that we are especially pleased that the Leader of the Opposition has been in southern Africa and making the sort of remarks about the criminal apartheid regime that the Government refuse to make? My right hon. Friend has been representing the majority British point of view about what is happening in South Africa.

Mr. Wakeham: I have nothing further to add. If the right hon. Gentleman has to explain himself to his colleagues, that is up to him.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Will my right hon. Friend reconsider my request last week for an urgent debate on the Cleveland child sex abuse case? He courteously wrote to me and said that that was not possible, but since then Dr. Higgs has repeated her assertion that all her diagnoses were correct and Michael Bishop has repeated his assertion that his department was right to take children away from their parents when they were manifestly not sexually abused. One has only to read the judgment of both Judge Myrella Cohen and Lord Justice Butler-Sloss to come to that conclusion. It would be a manifest injustice to people in my constituency and the area if the House were to rise for the summer recess before we had a debate on this subject.

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that this is an important subject and how strongly my hon. Friend and his constituents feel about it. I cannot promise him Government time, but there are ways in which he could raise the matter in the House before the summer recess. I invite him to do that.

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): Is the Leader of the House aware that the amendments to the Education Reform Bill constitute a document that is larger than the Education Act 1944? Does he believe that it is reasonable and fair, or that it has anything to do with improving the education opportunities of all our children, to consider such a lengthy document with so many amendments in two days? Will he give a commitment that we will have more time to debate this issue, which is vital for the nation and its children?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that this is an important measure and also that it is substantially longer than the 1944 Act. A substantial number of the amendments are technical and constitute concessions, and I believe that the time that I have allocated is adequate and will prove to be so. I have said that I will consider the matter again, but I do not think I can add anything further.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Will my right hon. Friend talk today to the Lord Chancellor and Lord Denham with a view to some action—not a statement—next week to prevent the very large number of our constituents who visit the Houses of Parliament having to queue in the rain before they come in? If we can put up an awning for the State opening of Parliament, we can put one up for the people who want to visit their Parliament day after day.

Mr. Wakeham: That matter has been looked at in the past and, of course, can be looked at again, but with all the powers I have, I do not think I could organise that for next week.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): Will the Leader of the House give permission to the Prime Minister to tell us next week about the angry exchanges that she no doubt had with the President of Turkey about the lack of human rights and the lack of respect for the Helsinki Final Act in Turkey, and the angry demands which she no doubt made for the removal of his troops of occupation from the northern part of Cyprus? They have been occupying part of a fellow Commonwealth country since 1974.

Mr. Wakeham: I can only repeat what I said last week. Turkey is a dependable ally with which we enjoy a close relationship, and President Evren is a welcome guest here.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Will my right hon. Friend arrange an urgent debate on the role of the Leader of the Opposition, especially with reference to the tradition of the House—which seems now to be cast aside—that senior politicians, such as the Leader of the Opposition, do not criticise the Government when abroad? Will my right hon. Friend also arrange for a debate on the encouragement of South African exports by the Leader of the Opposition in drinking South African wine? Also, will he arrange for a debate on the role of the Leader of the Opposition in by-elections? Perhaps he could suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should at least be in this country during by-elections.

Mr. Wakeham: As I have said to several of my hon. Friends, I have no responsibility—for which I am greatly relieved—for what the Leader of the Opposition decides to do or not to do. I have outlined some very important business for the House to deal with next week, and that will be the most profitable way for the House to spend its time. I have enough difficulties dealing with that business.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): The Leader of the House will no doubt be aware that, last Wednesday, the Public Accounts Committee published its 31st report on "Naval Warship and Weapons Procurement". I should like him to arrange a debate on that important report next week, but if he cannot do so will he draw the following controversial point to the Prime Minister's attention? The Ministry of Defence told the Public Accounts Committee that "they sought to avoid getting into a situation where one contractor won all the business in warship procurement, which might give short-term but not long-term value for money."

That is what the Ministry of Defence told the Public Accounts Committee, yet the Leader of the House will recall that last Monday the junior Minister for Defence Procurement came to the Dispatch Box and announced that the whole frigate programme was being placed with one yard. That was precisely the opposite of what the PAC had been told. The House is entitled to know whether the MOD has changed its mind or whether the PAC has been substantially misled.

Mr. Wakeham: A third explanation is that the hon. Gentleman has got it a bit muddled. The Government respond to reports from the PAC at the proper time, when they have given them proper consideration, and that is what they will do on this occasion. I am not prepared to arrange a debate in advance of a response from the Government to the PAC's report.

Sir John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Is my right hon. Friend aware that British Telecom is still giving franchises to allow the transmission of pornographic material on the telephones? Will he arrange for the Home Secretary to come to the House next week and put a stop to that vile practice which is corrupting our youth?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not know that I can get my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to come to the House to make a statement, but I am sure that those responsible for such matters and those responsible when there are any breaches of the law will have heard what my hon. Friend said and will take the appropriate action.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): May I revert to the answer that the right hon. Gentleman gave my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), calling in aid the Financial Services Bill? That was not subject to a guillotine, whereas the Bill that we are to debate on Wednesday will be subject to a guillotine. When there is a guillotine on a Bill with 500 amendments time is needed to discuss it properly. While some of the amendments are technical, other amendments from the Lords concern matters which have not been discussed either in Committee or on Report in this House and there is need for time to do that. Does he realise that, although announcing the rising of the House on 29 July and the return on 19 October, he seems to be rushing a Bill which will affect every person and every family in this country, and that the country will not forgive a Government who rush through such a Bill or an Opposition that allow them to do so?

Mr. Wakeham: I did not pretend that I was quoting an exact parallel. I recognise that there is a difference between a Bill under a guillotine and a Bill not under a guillotine. But the House dealt with 580 amendments to the Financial Services Bill, which shows that inherently the number of amendments is not the only factor to take into account. The Education Reform Bill has already had more than 200 hours of discussion in the House of Commons and some 150 hours in the House of Lords. I believe that the time that I have allocated is adequate, but, as I have said, I am prepared to have discussions through the usual channels.

Mr. Andrew McKay (Berkshire, East): As I gather that next week the Leader of the Opposition will be coming back from his safari, would it not be a placatory end-of-term gesture for my right hon. Friend to change the business next week and arrange for a debate on one-party states in southern Africa to give the Leader of the Opposition an opportunity to speak on something of which he has first-hand experience?

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend tempts me, but I shall not fall for the temptation.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Is there anything in the Education Reform Bill next week which will ensure that in future the Conservative party will be able to recruit much better qualified Back Benchers, rather than the bunch that we have had today asking illiterate questions based on an illiterate document and brief issued by Bernard Ingham? Surely for £22,500 their constituents are entitled to expect a much higher standard than primary 5 or 6.

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman usually makes a better fist of it than that; he is usually a good performer on these occasions. I did not notice him here at 3 o'clock this morning to discuss the motion on short speeches, so that is not the excuse. I think that he must have welcomed my suggestion of a holiday beginning at the end of July.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Will my right hon. Friend arrange an early debate on manners, conventions and the behaviour of Members of this place outside the Chamber? Is he not particularly disturbed at the denigration of this country by the Leader of the Opposition during his recent visit to Africa and his very unpatriotic remarks about the conventions of this House? Is not my right hon. Friend also disturbed by the fact that today some 40 Labour Members left the Kensington by-election to visit my constituency, without letting me know, on a fruitless exercise to celebrate the terrorist Nelson Mandela's birthday?

Mr. Wakeham: I have some sympathy with my hon. Friend, but conventions and good manners are primarily a matter of self-discipline. Right hon. and hon. Members must decide how they feel they should behave, and conduct themselves accordingly.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Hopefully, Sir, business for next week. As the West German courts have found that there was no Libyan involvement whatsoever in the bombing of the Berlin disco, and as the Prime Minister listened to and acted on the lying misrepresentations of General Vernon Walters about the involvement of Libya and allowed British bases to be used outside NATO arrangements for the bombing of Tripoli, when can the House have an opportunity to debate the necessary compensation that should be paid both to the Libyan Government and to the Libyan people?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not accept all the points in the hon. Gentleman's question, but it is not for me to comment in detail on what he said. I will see that the matter which he raises is referred to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): As one who spends more time than some other hon. Members in this House, and as one who is used, particularly in important debates, to the sea-green purity, the ininterrupted purity, of those on the Opposition Benches, particularly in debates on education reform and the community charge, may I say how pleased I and, I am sure, many of my colleagues would be to stay here for the first week of August, or even the whole of August, to get that important, vital, popular and progressive business through the House? Will my right hon. Friend, when he is having discussions through the usual channels, ask the hon. Gentleman the shadow Leader of the House how many of his hon. Friends would actually be here in August to debate this business, because I think that when he gets the answer to that question he will find out the true meaning of the word "cant"?

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend is far too modest. I know from my time as Patronage Secretary, and my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary knows, that there are no limits to the support that my hon. Friend will give the Government on all occasions. If we asked him to stay for the whole of August and September, I know that he would do so very willingly, and I am very grateful to him for his support.

Ms. Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): Is the Leader of the House aware of the proposed closure of Marconi Radar in my constituency and the decision by Marconi to concentrate production in the south-east? Does he not agree that this decision, which has caused dismay on Tyneside, raises important regional and management considerations which should be given early examination by the House?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the hon. Lady's concern. I know that any closures are distressing to the people concerned, but some of them are inevitable and cannot be avoided. I recognise that this raises important issues. I have a lot of Marconi workers in my own constituency, and very high-quality, skilled workers they are, but I cannot promise an early debate on the subject.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Will my right hon. Friend resist demands for extra time to be given for the Local Government Finance Bill on the ground that, contrary to what we have heard today, given the number of concessions and the way in which the Government have won virtually every vote in the other place, there are only one or two matters of substantial difference between the two Houses? One night will be quite sufficient for the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) to make his reputation in the Labour party by explaining what Labour party policy is. How many seconds were available to discuss each amendment on the various Bills when the last Labour Government introduced four—or was it five?—guillotine motions in one day?

Mr. Wakeham: It was five guillotine motions in one day, but that was not something for which I had any responsibility. My hon. Friend makes a very fair point. The Local Government Finance Bill had two days' debate in this House on Second Reading; 147 hours in Committee and five days on Report and Third Reading. It has had one day in the Lords on Second Reading, over 54 hours in Committee, 24 hours on Report and one day on Third Reading. The matters that are outstanding are important, but, I believe, relatively simple for the House to resolve.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): Should there not be a special debate next week on the role of the Tory media, remembering the slogan, "Make it simple, make it short and make it up"? I say that specifically about a rape case involving a young person who had her name mentioned in The Sun, causing great distress to her family. Is it not time that there were controls? Government Ministers speak about decency and good manners. Is it not time that we saw decency and good manners in the British media, particularly in the so-called popular press?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise when an injustice is done to somebody in the newspapers, but I have no comment to make on an individual case. There are ways of seeking redress, and I do not believe that a debate next week would be the way forward, although I recognise that this is an important matter.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): When my right hon. Friend is discussing through the usual channels the timetable for the Education Reform Bill, will he bear in mind that all the contentious issues raised today by the Opposition were fully explored in Committee and on the Floor of the House and that the concessions made arising from those discussions were widely welcomed on both sides of the House and outside? Will he also bear in mind that there are relatively few points of contention remaining between this House and the House of Lords and that, above all, those in schools, universities and polytechnics who are responsible for implementing the provisions of the Bill require certainty as soon as possible so that they can undertake the necessary planning?

Mr. Wakeham: Absolutely. My hon. Friend puts his points extremely clearly. I am sure that everybody accepts the validity of his argument.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): One of the great scandals in our midst is that of mass unemployment. From today's figures we can see that there are still large parts of the country with high unemployment. Wolverhampton is today marked as the black spot for unemployment in the west midlands. Lying behind those statistics is the human tragedy of people languishing on the dole when they want to make a contribution to society. I want to ask the Leader of the House if he will advise his Government that they should not be euphoric——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should ask for a debate.

Mr. Turner: I am asking the Leader of the House a question. Will he make a statement of hope to all those people whom I have mentioned? Will he, before the summer recess, give them some hope that the Government will provide an opportunity for them to find a job and security at an early date?

Mr. Wakeham: I know that the hon. Gentleman speaks for his constituents, and that is perfectly right. He must recognise that, although unemployment is a tragedy for anyone, the Government have to continue with the policies they believe will bring unemployment down, as it has been coming down month after month for many months now. A welcome from him for what has been achieved over the past two years or so in falling unemployment would be appreciated, particularly as one of the areas in which unemployment is falling fastest is the west midlands.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): Will my right hon. Friend ask the Foreign Secretary to make a statement to the House about British-Zimbabwean relationships because a gross insult was paid to the leader of the Opposition when he landed in Zimbabwe yesterday? There was no VIP to meet him and he was treated in a disgraceful way because he was not regarded as a very important person. Also, the Zimbabwean press has treated a senior Member of the House in a disgraceful way. He was not even recognised because journalists were asking, "Which one is Kinnock?"

Mr. Wakeham: That matter has been raised with me once or twice before. If I provided time for all the debates for which hon. Members are asking, it would not be a question of our rising on 29 July but we would hardly rise in time to come back on 19 October.

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): The Leader of the House will be aware of the publication by British Rail this morning of possible options on rail links with the Channel tunnel. He will be aware that many people believe the report to be unambitious and inappropriate. Will he arrange for a statement on rail transport to be made next week?

Mr. Wakeham: The Government welcome the publication of the report, which gives British Rail's most recent analysis of the capacity of the existing network and the options for improving speed and capacity between London and the tunnel if, as seems likely, it becomes necessary at some time in the future. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that much more work needs to be done before British Rail is ready to offer firm conclusions and recommendations. It is for British Rail to pursue its studies in consultation with local authorities and other interested parties in the affected areas.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Will the Leader of the House reconsider his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South (Ms. Primarolo) and arrange an urgent debate on Nicaragua next week? Will he accept that people who have been there perhaps know a little more about what is going on? Will he further accept that after a recent conversation with the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, who came out with what I would consider to be non-factual information about the country, perhaps there is an urgent need for the House to have a debate, not least to educate some Conservative Members in what is happening there? That country, which is smaller than England and has a population of fewer than 3 million, is fighting a war against the most powerful nation on earth. Congress at this moment is being asked to reconsider funding lethal aid to a hostile army of 9 million. It is an urgent matter, and I urge the Leader of the House to reconsider his remarks.

Mr. Wakeham: I told the hon. Member for Bristol, South (Ms. Primarolo) that I cannot find time for a debate next week. I have to stick to that view.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): May I make a helpful suggestion to the Leader of the House for when he returns to the usual channels to discuss next week's business? Would it not help if he were to propose that Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday should be spent on the Education Reform Bill, that the poll tax Bill should have three days' debate when we return in October and that the Housing Bill, which is in a shambles, should be dropped and we should have a new Bill in the next Session that really deals with the housing problems facing Britain? If the right hon. Gentleman has confidence in the legislative programme of the Government and believes in democracy, I am sure that he will recognise and be confident of the fact that the issues will be properly debated in the House.

Mr. Wakeham: I have confidence not only in the Government's legislative programme but in the fact that the House will approve it. I recognise that the hon. Gentleman made his suggestions in a spirit of helpfulness to the Government, but I regret that I must reject them.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): The reply given by the Leader of the House to my hon. Friends the Members for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) and for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) is not good enough when we are talking about the poll tax. The Leader of the House accepted that the examples given in the reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr were not identical. Therefore, there is room for the Leader of the House to reconsider the time allowed—I am not talking about minutes—to discuss the massive number of amendments from the House of Lords.

The reference to the hours that have been spent on the Bill in the House has no significance when we consider that 500 amendments have been submitted for consideration by the other place. In all fairness to the House and the people outside, there should be sufficient time—not minutes, but days—to discuss the poll tax Bill amendments so that we can ensure that there is a full and honest debate on that important issue. May we have an assurance that there will be sufficient time, not seconds, to discuss that important Bill?

Mr. Wakeham: I should not have proposed what I have unless I thought that it allowed sufficient time. I stand by that view. It is no good me pretending that one can look back to a past Bill and draw a correct and complete analogy. I have to justify the time for this Bill and the Lords amendments. I believe that the time I have proposed is adequate. It will be for the House to decide, but I have told the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends that there will be discussions through the usual channels. I do not believe that I can be more reasonable than that.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Given the answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien), which makes it look as if there will not be an extension of the debate on the poll tax, and given the fact that the Bill will be in operation in Scotland, may we have a debate to discuss the serious constitutional and democratic crisis that has arisen as a result of the production of that legislation, which will cut the franchise, destroy civil liberties and bring about the end of local government as we have known it in the past? We should have a debate that covers the wide range of constitutional problems facing us now.

Mr. Wakeham: That sounds like a repeat of a speech which the hon. Gentleman may have made in the many hours during which we discussed the legislation, or perhaps a trailer for the speech which he hopes to make in the debate on the Lords amendments, if he is called. I do not believe that it requires any comment from me during business questions.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On Friday 22 July the White Paper on official secrets is to be discussed. Will the Attorney-General respond to the debate? After all, he has spent over £1 million of taxpayers' money trying to suppress "Spycatcher". If he is in the House to answer the debate, as one hopes, we will be able to raise the issue of why he has allowed Tory sympathisers in MI5 to organise a seditious conspiracy against the 1974 Labour Government on evidence provided and never refuted by any member of the Government. Yet there has been no prosecution. Not even a little finger has been lifted by the Attorney-General to seek out the malefactors. Instead, he has thrown away £1 million of taxpayers' money on trying to suppress the truth.

Mr. Wakeham: It is not normal, in announcing the business, to announce who the speakers will be in any debate, but I should be surprised if the Attorney-General were to take part in the debate, which is in essence a Home Office matter. I should have thought that it was appropriate for the Home Secretary to take part. If the hon. Gentleman hopes to be called in the debate, may I suggest that he does a little homework before he comes to the House? He should recognise that the White Paper is about the reform of criminal law and that the matter to which he has referred was dealt with under the civil law.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): In all seriousness, will the Leader of the House reconsider the answer that he gave a few moments ago to my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin)? Will he arrange for an early statement on what the Government intend to do to prevent the closure of Marconi in Gateshead, with the loss of 450 jobs? Will he repudiate the answer given by the Minister of Trade and Industry yesterday, who implied that this was not a matter for the Government? Given the fact that not only will social and economic issues face the locality, but that there will be a loss of Government revenue and an increase in Government expenditure consequent on the closure, will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for a statement to be made? Will he reject the view that this is not a matter for the Government? If it is the view of Ministers that the closure is not a matter for the Government, is it not time that that view was changed?

Mr. Wakeham: Individual decisions by management as to how it organises itself are not a matter for the Government, and I see no case for the Government making a statement on the matter. That does not mean that we are not concerned about individual cases of unemployment. We will seek to do what can be done. The whole thrust of the Government's economic policy has been to produce lasting and worthwhile jobs. Surely the announcement of the unemployment figures today is adequate confirmation that that policy is working.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): May I raise two matters with the Leader of the House? First, I hope that he remembers that recently on business questions I raised with him the difficulties that would arise for local authorities, including Bradford, if they were forced to make refunds to water authorities of sewerage charges. Will he ask officials in the Department of the Environment to write to me suggesting how I can raise the matter in the avalanche of amendments to the Local Government Finance Bill, so that I may have some warning as to when I need to be in the Chamber?

Secondly, may I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to early-day motion 1246, which is an attempt to secure a debate on the substantial increase in visa fees, which means that children are being charged £60 each to join their families in this country?

[That the Consular Fees (Amendment) Order 1988 (S.I., 1988, No. 925), dated 25th May 1988, be revoked.]

Will the Leader of the House arrange a debate before 29 July so that Government Ministers can seek to justify why they are erecting financial obstacles to families being united in this country?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not know what I can do to help the hon. Gentleman on the first point.

Mr. Madden: Just try.

Mr. Wakeham: Absolutely; I will try. If we can indicate to the hon. Gentleman in any way when he should be in the Chamber to make his contribution to the debate, without having to sit around, we will do so. I shall ask the Minister who is on duty to do his best for the hon. Gentleman, but I cannot guarantee 100 per cent. success.

The other matter is one for discussion through the usual channels.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Why does the Leader of the House not stop trying to flannel hon. Members about the guillotine next week on the poll tax legislation? Why does he refer constantly to the fact that he will have discussions through the usual channels, when he knows full well that he has no intention of changing his mind? He is just waiting for the end of questions on the business statement so that he can heave a sigh of relief and say, "I have got away with all that." The truth is that the poll tax guillotine is set against a background of hostile opposition, not only from everyone on the Opposition Benches, but from 37 Tory Members who were against certain aspects of it and in the House of Lords they had to bring in the greatest number of peers—some from as far away as Canada—since the introduction of the Common Market legislation. If the Government had any ring of democracy about them, they would put that legislation on one side. As for the taunts about turning up in August, some of us would come here long before the grouse season begins to fight against the poll tax legislation.

Mr. Wakeham: It sounds to me as though the grouse season has already begun. I do not know what the hon. Gentleman is asking me to do. Is he asking me not to have discussions through the usual channels? I have indicated what I propose to do. Whether the hon. Gentleman likes it or not, I shall do as I have said. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the Local Government Finance Bill has had a substantial amount of discussion, both in this House and in the Lords, and that I moved a timetable motion early on to make sure that it had proper discussion.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): May I thank the Leader of the House for his courteous response at 3 am this morning on the subject, among other matters, of the appointment of the European Commissioner? From his study of early-day motion 228 and the 10 other early-day motions, which Mr. Speaker has asked me not to mention by number so that they do not have to be printed in Hansard, does he not think it proper that the announcement of the appointment of the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) as a European Commissioner should be made in the House of Commons, so that hon. Members can ask questions about whether it is proper to appoint one of our colleagues who supposedly—repeat, supposedly—for 14 days deceived not only his senior Cabinet colleagues but his senior civil servants and his Prime Minister?

If the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks really did that in January 1986 and really deserved to be ousted from his position by, among others, the then Chief Whip—the Leader of the House will remember that in a previous incarnation he was Chief Whip—who, if we believe the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Critchley) in his book "Heseltine", told him that he could not stay, is it proper that the right hon. and learned Member should be appointed this country's European Commissioner without at least a debate next week in the House?

[That this House notes in the book, Campaign, by Rodney Tyler, the Selling of the Prime Minister: from behind the doors of Downing Street and Conservative Central Office—A unique inside account of the Battle for Power that the author on page 1, chapter 1, paragraph 1, sentence 1, states 'It was an extraordinary turnaround in fortunes from the moment on 27th January 1986 when Mrs. Thatcher secretly confided to a close associate that she might have to resign. . . . ' and on page 3 that 'On the eve of the crucial Westland debate she herself felt shaky enough to doubt her future, though some around her later sought to dismiss this as late evening anxieties of the sort that had disappeared the following morning. It is certainly true that if Leon Brittan had chosen to, he could have brought her to the brink of downfall, by naming the real culprits inside Number 10. Instead, he chose to remain silent', and calls on the Prime Minister to give a full account of what transpired between 3rd January and 27th January 1986, at Number 10 Downing Street, in relation to the selectively leaked Law Officer's letter concerning the Westland Affair.]

Mr. Wakeham: In order to comply with Mr. Speaker's request I will not mention the early-day motions that the hon. Gentleman has tabled. The hon. Gentleman must have been a little near to sleep at 3 am this morning if he thought that my response to the debate mentioned my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks. (Mr. Brittan) in any shape or form. I did not mention him. The hon. Gentleman has a wild and fervent imagination. I am amazed at some of the things that he says in the House.

Mr. Harry Ewing: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I apologise for raising a point of order, but during my question to the Leader of the House I referred to Government Members asking illiterate questions based on an illiterate document issued by Bernard Ingham. In my question I compared Government Members to five and six-year-olds. On reflection, that is an insult to our five and six-year-olds. I unreservedly withdraw any aspersion that I cast on five and six-year-olds.

Mr. Speaker: I think that we should get on with the Finance Bill.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Ordered,

That the draft Pesticides (Maximum Residue Levels in Food) Regulations 1988 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle.]

KP Foods

4.49 pm

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the past you have very kindly helped me when I have tried to raise the issue of the closure of the KP Foods factory in my constituency. I wonder whether you can help me further. I have since discovered that 550 of the workers who will lose their jobs in that factory will not show up in the Government's unemployment statistics. Perhaps you can guide me to the Department and the set of statistics in which I will find those 550 workers listed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Lady knows that it is not my role or function to give tactical advice. I am sure that there are others better qualified than me to do that.

Orders of the Day

Finance (No. 2) Bill

Order for Third reading read.

4.50 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Major): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Bill gives effect to the most far-reaching reforms of the personal tax system that we have witnessed in this country in a single Budget. Whatever else may divide us—we have discovered during the passage of the Bill that the Government and the Opposition are divided on some aspects of the Budget—we are united in recognising the significance of the reforms set out in the Bill.

Through all our debates, in Committee and on the Floor of the House, two facts have shone through with increasing clarity. The first is that the Government have a coherent and successful strategy for taxation, and the second is that the Opposition do not. Those facts not only divide the Government and Opposition; they are one of the main reasons that explain why we remain the Government and they remain the Opposition.

One notable feature of our debates has been the lengths to which the Opposition have often seemed to want to go to avoid debating taxation. They have been very reluctant to commit themselves to any specific proposals. Yesterday they tried, and failed, to have a rerun of the public expenditure debates that we all enjoyed last February.

It is no surprise that the Opposition want to avoid debating tax at all costs. They know, as we know and as the country knows, that the 1988 Budget of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was a landmark. It marked the final and decisive move away from a tax regime based on envy to a tax regime designed to promote enterprise and efficiency and thus to enhance prosperity. The measures contained in this Finance Bill are not a one-off; they are the logical consequence of a series of measures introduced in nine successive Budgets and enacted in successive Finance Bills with one clear aim in mind—not, as the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) would have it, to line the pockets of the "super-rich", but to improve the supply performance of the economy.

It is self-evident that that is working. Our macro-economic policies, designed to keep downward pressure on inflation and create the right framework for growth in the private sector, have been focused on improving incentives and creating a culture that encourages risk-taking and makes investment worth while. The investment boom, the like of which we have not seen for a considerable number of years, is not unrelated to the change in cultural attitudes that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and his predecessors have brought about.

Opposition Members have either never understood that change or have never wished to understand it; it is not clear which. As far as one can see, they remain wedded to the orthodoxy of the 1960s—that the only purpose of cutting tax rates is to give a sluggish economy a short-term fiscal boost. That is stone age economics, and they ought to know better by now.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): Will the Chief Secretary confirm a figure that the Treasury has produced? Will he confirm that of the £1·8 billion that has gone in tax relief to the top 1 per cent., £0·7 billion—£700 million—has gone in tax relief on unearned income? That £700 million could have prevented cuts in housing benefit, the freezing of child benefit and the creation of the social fund. Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us how giving £700 million in tax relief on unearned income to the top 1 per cent., who already earn on average £75,000 a year, boosts incentives to work?

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman is talking about investment income, which provides jobs and the economic growth that funds so many of the social services, which the hon. Gentleman claims to care about. I propose to deal with that point directly later and we shall then examine the reality of the tax changes.

It is important to understand the distinction that I mentioned a moment ago. The measures on the Finance Bill—contrary to what the Opposition have said—do not add to demand. Although tax rates have been cut, the tax burden itself has not—as Opposition Members occasionally point out to us during Treasury Question Time. The measures were enough to prevent the tax burden rising, but no more. The Budget and the Bill improve incentives and hence improve supply side performance.

In the long run, that means more growth, more jobs and more prosperity. In their obsession with the short run, the Opposition never seem to think of the medium and long term, yet all of us should have our minds fixed firmly on the medium and long-term outcome. The Opposition have no answer to the fact that our supply side measures are working. That is why they have conjured up false dragons to slay. Ludicrously, they appoint themselves the guardians of fiscal rectitude—unlikely casting to the mind of anyone who remembers the Labour party in government—and they tell us that the Budget is irresponsible.

It is hard to take lectures on fiscal rectitude from a party which, 13 months ago, fought an election with plans to spend an extra £35 billion in its back pocket—a party that planned not a public sector debt repayment of £3 billion but a massively inflated borrowing requirement. [Laughter.] Opposition Members may giggle like schoolgirls on an outing, but they have no proper economic policy, no tax policy and no understanding of what is going on. Until they change all that, they will remain what they are now—an Opposition with no policy and no hope.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): How can the Chief Secretary equate the claim that the Government have not increased the tax burden overall with the proposition that the redistribution of the tax burden by the Budget does not contribute to demand? Surely, by giving differentially high tax breaks to people at the top end of the income scale, he is contributing to a massive and extremely damaging increase in imports and consumption. That has given rise to the extraordinary news that the trade gap expected for the whole year has now been massively exceeded in the first five months of the year, to the tune of £4·7 billion.

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman makes some interesting observations, which suffer from only one defect: they are all wrong. The principal redistribution in the tax system is that there is now an increasing yield from corporate taxes because of the profitability of industry and commerce. That is why the sum total of the tax burden remains the same and has not fallen, and the burden of income tax has dropped—a very desirable development.

Yesterday we heard an interesting proposition about borrowing from the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). Uncharacteristically, he praised the virtues of the Government's being in debt and borrowing rather than balancing the budget and being out of debt. That is a remarkable proposition. His speech was not a casual aberration; its substance seems to have been carefully press-released and circulated, apparently before the new clause was selected.

The only virtue in the hon. Gentleman's speech was that it called forth a gem of a response from my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow). Those who heard the debate will understand what I mean. I propose to place my hon. Friend's speech beside my bed for constant reference. It can sit there in precisely the same way as the speeches of the former Labour Prime Minister, Lord Callaghan, and the letters to Dr. Johannes Witteveen from the former Chancellor, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), sit beside my hon. Friend's bed. Yesterday was a memorable occasion, and the most memorable aspect of it was the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): The Chief Secretary to the Treasury will, of course, have read the text of my speech in Hansard, rather than rely on his rather wayward recollection of what he thinks I might have said. If he reads my speech, he will find that I said:

"Inevitably from time to time a Government will need to borrow. There will be times when a Government want to be in surplus. It all depends on the circumstances at the time." —[Official Report, 13 July 1988: Vol. 137, c. 396.]

That is what his hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne also said.

Mr. Major: I also had the pleasure of listening to the whole thrust of the hon. Gentleman's remarks, which, as hon. Members who were in the House will recall, was precisely as I have described it. What the hon. Gentleman cannot take is the fact that the Government's finances are in surplus. The current account deficit, of which he tried to make so much a moment ago, essentially reflects purely private sector behaviour. That is a factor that the Opposition frequently tend to ignore. The contrast with the deficits over which the Labour Government presided could scarcely be more stark. Under Labour, a balance of payments deficit meant a balance of payments crisis. Today, that is certainly not the case.

Mr. Smith: I must ask the Chief Secretary to put the record right and to agree that the comment I have just read out is an accurate quote fron the Hansard record of our proceedings. It is there on the record, from yesterday's discussions. The right hon. Gentleman has been attempting to paint my remarks with a complete fabrication of reality.

Mr. Major: I do not doubt that the partial quotation that the hon. Gentleman gave reflected a portion of his speech. If he wishes to redefine his speech and say that that is what he meant, the House will observe that. I stick by the fact that the impression given by the whole of the hon. Gentleman's remarks yesterday was precisely that which I have described, and I do not renege from that in the slightest.

Mr. Morgan: Try facts for a change.

Mr. Major: The hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan), screaming like a banshee from a sedentary position, suggests that I should try facts for a change. Judging from the hon. Gentleman's record, he would not recognise a fact if it jumped up and gripped him by the windpipe.

The Budget's aim was not to boost demand, but to improve supply side performance. Tax reform is not the sole route to that objective. We have removed a whole battery of the constraints and regulations that acted as barriers to growth. We have at every opportunity extended competition and flexibility. We have allowed managers to manage, given trade unions back to their members, and minimised Government intervention in the affairs of industry and of the industrialists who create wealth and jobs. Through the manifest success of privatisation, we have dramatically extended ownership and removed a substantial section of British industry from state control. The result can be seen in industry's improved performance.

Tax reform has played a vital part in improving the economy's performance, and that performance is the overriding test by which those reforms stand to be judged. The record is overwhelming, and the Opposition know it. We are now entering the eighth successive year of sustained growth averaging 3 per cent.—a performance not equalled for half a century. We are at the top of the European growth league, after two decades at the bottom. Inflation is back to the levels of the 1950s and 1960s, and, in manufacturing industry, productivity has risen by more than 5 per cent. per year—faster than in any other major industrialised country. That is a remarkable turnaround for our country.

Far from that being the short-lived "boomlet" beloved of Opposition spokesmen, who believe that stop follows go, as night follows day—they proved it when they were in government—the outlook is for higher investment and continued growth. The latest CBI survey continues a run of surveys confirming, yet again, industry's strength and the high level of confidence about business prospects generally. This year, investment intentions have strengthened substantially, with the DTI's June survey predicting that manufacturing investment will rise by 16 per cent. in the present financial year.

The economy's strength has created the conditions for the longest period of falling unemployment since the war. Among other things, that has confounded the prediction of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), who, in October 1986, wrote in "Friday Agenda" in The Guardian:

> "The Government simply cannot reduce unemployment by present economic policies".

That is what he wrote. Perhaps people believed him then, but they know better now. Even the hon. Gentleman can see that unemployment is falling in every region of the country and that some of the largest falls are among the long-term unemployed. If the hon. Gentleman catches your eye, Mr. Speaker, he may care to comment on that article, on why he was wrong, on how his perspective has changed, and on what he now proposes to do to revise the Opposition's policies, so that they may follow those which are proving so successful for the Government at present.

Only this morning, figures were released showing another significant fall of nearly 40,000 in unemployment, in June. That is the 23rd successive monthly fall. The figures also show another significant rise in the number of jobs, which is up by more than 600,000 over the past year. Since 1983, the British economy has shown a greater capacity to create jobs than any other European country. Unemployment is not falling because of some irresponsible fiscal stimulus; it is falling precisely because we have created conditions in which businesses can expand and employ more people.

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): The Government are fiddling the figures.

Mr. Major: The hon. Lady says that we are fiddling the figures. There have been 23 successive months of falling unemployment and an extra 600,000 jobs, yet she sits there and accuses us of fiddling the figures. Where has she been for the past 23 months, that she has not seen the changes?

During that same period, living standards rose at all levels of earnings. Since 1979, real take-home pay for the family man on average earnings has increased by 27·5 per cent. Between 1974 and 1979 the increase was less than 1 per cent. That is a comparison that even the Opposition may wish to ponder for a moment. For the man on half average earnings, the increase was 21·5 per cent. with us, and only 4 per cent. during the period of the last Labour Government. That is no coincidence.

Those are the results of Britain's transformation into a high-performance enterprise economy, whether the Opposition like it or not. Because they do not like it, they pretend not to notice that transformation. The electors do, as successive general election results have shown. The Bill's measures are designed to carry that transformation further forward, to consolidate and build on the achievements of the past few years.

The difference between the Government and the Opposition is that our proposals rest on a clear philosophy of reform and on a record of success that is plain for all to see. The Opposition suffer from a credibility gap and a policy gap: they have no credibility and they have no policy. In particular, they have no policy for the future, but a record of past government that they—and most of the people who lived through it—would rather forget.

Nowhere was that more clearly illustrated than in the Opposition's attitude to the Bill's most important clauses —those dealing with income tax changes. The Opposition voted against the higher tax cuts. We expected that, for it was consistent with their philosophy. However, after much agonising, and with few of their normal fanfares, the Opposition slipped quietly into the Division Lobby to vote against the basic rate reduction for 24 million taxpayers.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): We did not keep quiet about it.

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman says that the Opposition did not keep quiet about it. Even those masters of the press release who sit on the Opposition Front Bench failed to issue one on their decision to vote against our cut in the marginal tax rate for 24 million taxpayers. Where was the article in "Friday Agenda" in The Guardian, justifying the Opposition's vote against a cut in the basic rate? At least they were consistent, because they voted against the basic rate cuts last year, too. Very probably, they will do so in respect of any future basic rate cuts that we may achieve, They cannot hide the fact that they are the high tax party, however many press releases they choose to forgo.

The changes in income tax are the essence of the Bill. They will produce one of the simplest personal tax structures in the world, fulfilling our pledge of a 25p basic rate, and reverse for good the absurd structure of nine higher rates and surcharges on investment income on top—the system which we inherited in 1979. The changes allow people to keep more of their own money—almost £5 a week for the man on average earnings—and thus help further to improve living standards. Another advantage in cutting taxes is that it also reduces substantially the value of tax breaks and perks and removes the need to waste time and effort in tax planning.

Opposition Members have described the Budget as one for the super-rich. No doubt they believe that, given that they have said it repeatedly. No doubt the hon. Member for Wrexham goes to sleep at night muttering that particular fact—[HON. MEMBERS: "He never sleeps."] Those of us who served on the Committee can well believe that the hon. Gentleman never sleeps.

The Opposition have said that we have done nothing for the poor, but, even after this year's Budget changes, the burden of income tax and national insurance has shifted markedly away from the very poorest toward the best off. The hon. Member for Dumfermline, East knows that—perhaps better than anyone else in the House—because the figures that illustrate that were compiled in response to a parliamentary question that he asked.

Those figures show that the bottom 20 per cent. of income taxpayers have seen real reductions in their average liability since 1978-79. The liability for the lowest 10 per cent. is down by 19 per cent. The top 10 per cent., however, are now paying 26 per cent. more than they were in 1978-79, despite the reduction in the top income tax rates from 83 per cent. to 60 per cent. and now to 40 per cent. In some eyes the old regime may have appeared to share the burden of tax more fairly. I understand that, but, because so few people actually paid tax at those absurdly high rates, the burden was less fairly shared than it is now. The reality is that Labour's income tax fairness was a mirage—our income tax reductions are real and they are there for all taxpayers.

As I have said before, the overriding logic and justification for the reforms is not to point up the ineffectiveness of the Opposition—enjoyable and necessary though that may be—but to strengthen the supply performance of the economy. The Chancellor made that absolutely clear in the Budget debate when he said that the changes are not a reward, but a challenge to British business. That is his fundamental argument, with which I entirely agree. I believe that business also agrees with it. The Association of British Chambers of Commerce said:

"We wanted incentives. We have got them."

The message is also understood abroad—[HON. MEMBERS: "What about the CBI?"] I am intrigued that hon. Members should mention the CBI. I remind them that after the Budget the CBI said:

"This is the Budget that we have been waiting for. It will provide greater incentives for all in British business."

That was the CBI's stated position after the Budget.

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the northern division of the CBI thought that the Budget was most damaging for jobs in the north and that it was especially critical of the extension of the business expansion scheme to housing in London?

Mr. Major: I was quoting the views of the national CBI, but I hope that its northern branch and the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) will also observe the greatly improving employment prospects in the north, the north-west and all the other regions of the United Kingdom, where there has been a significant improvement in the past 23 months. I hope that that gives pleasure to all hon. Members.

Although the income tax changes were undoubtedly the most important, the Finance Bill introduced other considerable changes which will create a more just and, in my judgment, a more efficient tax system. Lower income tax rates have enabled us to achieve a radical reform of the taxation of capital gains, aligning rates with those on income and thus reducing the incentive to convert income into gains, or to pursue speculative gains to avoid higher rate tax. That measure, at least, was welcomed by Opposition Members, although, as usual, despite their welcome, they failed to recognise that that desirable change was possible only in parallel with the changes to income tax that they rejected out of hand.

The Bill also brings to an end the injustice of taxing pre-1982 gains, which owed much to the excessive inflation of Labour's years in office. Inheritance tax has been radically simplified, with a further increase in the threshold and a single rate of 40 per cent. Outside the North sea sector, the Bill will leave no tax rate above 40 per cent. The Bill abolishes capital duty altogether, the fifth tax removed by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. I trust, in due course, that he may be able to improve on that record.

The Bill brings about a radical improvement in the structure of personal taxation, giving married women full independence and privacy in their tax affairs—a reform long overdue. It has been widely welcomed in the House and outside. The ending of the anachronism of aggregation will be welcomed by all married women, and a large number of married pensioners will also be better off.

Other measures in the Bill end the absurd and anomalous tax penalties on marriage, which had no place in any sane or satisfactory tax system. Taken together, the reforms provide a fair deal to married couples and to married women in particular; and, as importantly, they are reforms which can be implemented speedily. Married women have been waiting nearly 180 years for equity in the tax system. It is right they should not be asked to wait much longer, and with this Finance Bill my right hon. Friend has ensured that they will not.

On top of the reforms, which in themselves add up to a substantial catalogue of change in areas previously found too difficult to tackle, the Bill contains a whole raft of measures designed to remove anomalies, reduce the scope for abuse and generally simplify the tax system. Ending relief for home improvement loans and hence focusing mortgage interest relief on its true purpose of promoting owner-occupation, taking forestry out of the tax system and tackling the under-taxation of company cars have all made their differing contributions to making the tax system fairer between individual taxpayers.

I have sought to make it clear that the Bill is primarily about improving supply performance. Better labour mobility is a vital element in that. The business expansion scheme already has a clear record of success. By extending it to the private rented sector we are giving a boost to housing deregulation, which is vital to achieve that objective. Deregulation is the key to extending real housing choice to the many people who cannot or do not want to be owner-occupiers, or at present have no choice other than a local authority house or a place on a council waiting list in an area without jobs.

The clause on this matter has provoked the Opposition as no other, for I fear that they are concerned at any measure that may break the local authority monopoly on rented housing. That may precipitate the end of their municipal fiefdoms, for surely they are coming to an end. Any contribution that this measure can make to creating a genuine private-rented sector in this country will bring positive economic and social benefits far outweighing the cost in revenue forgone.

The measures that I have outlined amount to a fundamental reform of the tax system and, not surprisingly, they have been unchanged in Committee. However, there are a few significant amendments, which I should mention to the House.

A principal theme of the Bill is that, as tax rates come down to sensible levels, it is as important as ever to ensure that everyone pays their fair share of tax. In Committee we have bolstered the company migration rules to ensure a capital gains tax charge when a company ceases to be United Kingdom resident by reason of a double taxation convention, plugged the loophole whereby restrictive convenants can be used as a tax-avoidance device, and prevented the use of trusts to avoid the higher tax rate on capital gains.

We have balanced those tightening-up measures by making a number of relaxations, most significantly on capital gains tax. Provisions were tabled on Report to give some benefit from rebasing in cases where, between 1982 and 1988, assets were acquired when holdover or rollover relief was claimed. We have enabled elections to be made for gains on certain pre-1982 assets to be computed by reference to 1982 values irrespective of acquisition cost. Those amendments were inspired by suggestions from Committee members and we were happy to accept them. The second will be a welcome simplification for those who make an election because it will remove the need to keep pre-1982 records. The company residence rules have been rationalised in various respects. In particular, certain United Kingdom incorporated companies that were non-resident at Budget day have been excluded from the ambit of the new regime.

My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) persuaded us that it was right to extend the special £5 million BES ceiling for ship chartering companies to those which operate their own ships. I was also pleased that we could make a worthwhile relaxation in the tax rules for seafarers which should ease the cost pressures on United Kingdom operators and allay fears about the availability of British-crewed ships for defence purposes.

One of the most remarkable features of these reforms is that they have been introduced against a backdrop of the soundest public finances that we have seen in decades. Important as tackling the supply side rigidities is and remains, our overriding priority remains the continued suppression and reduction of inflation. We give others incentives to take risks for the benefit of the country's future; we do not propose to take risks which would not benefit the country's future.

Perhaps one mark of my right hon. Friend's achievement in the Budget which paved the way for this Finance Bill is this. If he were prepared to tolerate the levels of borrowing seen under the Labour Government, we need not have been debating the reduction of basic rate tax from 27p to 25p; we could have been debating the complete abolition of income tax. We prefer to move rather more cautiously. Once the Bill is on the statute book, we can look forward to further tax reductions—to the reduction of income tax to 20p in the pound. But I can give the House the assurance that we will not achieve that objective on the back of a burgeoning Government borrowing requirement now or in future. But achieve it we most assuredly will, and as soon as we prudently can.

Meanwhile, I invite my right hon. and hon. Friends to give this momentous Bill its Third Reading.

5.21 pm

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): When we are debating the most controversial financial measures that any Government have introduced since the war, when we are debating a Bill which has been debated more days in Committee than any other Finance Bill of this Parliament and when we are debating a Bill the contents of which are infused with measures which promote selective generosity towards the rich, both sides of the House will agree that we might have expected the presence of at least one Social Democratic and Liberal party spokesman. It is remarkable that the relaunch of that party in the country has been accompanied by its virtual disappearance in the House. But at least that party is consistent. To miss this Third Reading debate is entirely in line with its performance in Committee, where it missed just about every sitting when major measures were being discussed.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): Surely the hon. Gentleman understands that it is probably more important to both parties to slug it out to see which comes bottom in today's by-election.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for pointing to another problem that faces the Liberals in their battle against the SDP led by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen).

I hoped to enjoy the Chief Secretary's speech, which, given the advance publicity of the new role that he might expect in the Government, we might have expected to be statesmanlike and to concentrate on the detail of the tax reform. But his speech seemed to be designed for the Prime Minister to read rather than for his colleagues to hear. I noticed that at least four of his colleagues, including the chairman of the Conservative party, dropped off to sleep for at least some moments during his remarks.

I understand the difficulties that the Chief Secretary faces. He is now working under the watchful eye of the Secretary of State for Energy who has been promoted to head of the Star Chamber and is the Chancellor of the Exchequer in waiting. We know that any spending decision that is popular will be attributed to the Secretary of State for Energy and that any decision which is unpopular, unfortunately, will be blamed on the Chief Secretary.

That is not the only problem facing the Chief Secretary. The cuts that he may impose as Chief Secretary in the next few months he may have to administer in a new role as Secretary of State for Social Services, if we are to believe the report in The Guardian on Monday. The reputation of toughness that he builds as Chief Secretary will destroy for ever his chance of gaining a reputation for compassion, if he were to arrive at the Department of Health and Social Security.

Perhaps the Chief Secretary's biggest problem is that he has been named, not least by The Guardian, as a favourite of the Prime Minister. He is a central figure at her court—someone who has been feted and no doubt invited to Chequers. But I know that the Chief Secretary is a cautious man and he will be aware of the fate of others who have been similarly feted, not least the Foreign Secretary who, in the Prime Minister's eyes, might as well be in the Foreign Legion as at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. The right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), who is not present this afternoon, is having to choose between exile in the House of Commons and a more lucrative exile in Brussels, if that is how the decision goes.

Missing from the speech of the Chief Secretary was a willingness to address himself to the central problems of the Finance Bill. The Budget, which almost all the country regarded as unfair when it was announced in March, is, as we warned, now also seen to be ill-judged. It is unfair because with the top 1 per cent.—no matter what figures the Chief Secretary produces, he cannot deny this—securing 31 per cent. of the Budget's spoils and more than the bottom 70 per cent. of the Budget's handouts, and with the gains to the top 1 per cent. being not just income tax handouts, but exemptions from capital gains tax and inheritance tax, the business expansion scheme and other tax loopholes, this Budget has done more to widen the gap between rich and poor than any Budget at any time since the second world war.

The Budget is also ill-judged and imprudent. When we said to the Chancellor that there was an imbalance between investment and consumption in the economy and a need for greater investment, particularly in the Health Service, for which there was an economic as well as a social case, he was instead determined to pursue a strategy of top-rate tax cuts. When we said to the Chancellor that there was an imbalance between the shires and the suburbs, and the regions, that there was overheating, congestion, pressure on the green belt, escalating house price in the shires and the suburbs but underused resources in the regions, which should benefit from the Budget, he chose a tax-cutting strategy with most benefit going to those already well off in the most prosperous shires and suburbs.

In contrast to the clear advantages that would have been gained from a strategy which involved targeted investment on our public services, instead of top-rate tax cuts, the strategy is backfiring, first, by worsening the credit boom, forcing up interest rates and adding to fears about inflation and, secondly, by creating a situation in which we shall pull in more imports and the balance of payments will worsen.

We are already seeing the effect of that in two areas. The five rises in interest rates which have pushed up industry's costs by £600 million on top of the 11 per cent. rise in electricity prices, which also cost £600 million for a full year, are making it more difficult for industry to compete with our competitors abroad. Secondly, as a result of the five interest rate rises, we are about to experience mortgage rate rises.

Mr. Major: If it is so difficult for industry, why is there an investment boom, the like of which we have not seen for many years?

Mr. Brown: The Chief Secretary would be the first to admit that even if all the CBI's predictions about manufacturing investment were to bear fruit—none has in the past—the rate of manufacturing investment in real terms would still be below the level left by the Labour Government in 1979.

If the Chief Secretary doubts my figures, let him consult the excellent brief produced on these matters by the Library. That shows clearly that even if manufacturing investment rose by the amount that the CBI has stipulated in its investment intentions survey—it wa quoted by the right hon. Gentleman—investment in real terms would still be below the 1979 level. I checked the figures this afternoon with the statisticians in the Library. If the Chief Secretary really believes that the Government have a good record in manufacturing investment, which is still below the level of 1979, he must set low targets for the Government's performance.

The second effect of the Budget, adding to the rising credit boom and the worsening balance of payments, has been the rise in interest rates, which are now forcing up mortgage rates. What people gained in tax cuts from the Budget they are now beginning to lose in price rises and mortgage rises that have followed from it. The tax handout was followed by the mortgage clawback—the clawback perhaps the inevitable and delayed consequence of the handout—with the spending power that the Chancellor appeared to offer in March being reined back in July. The consequence is that that they have wiped out most of the gains for almost every group, with the exception of the top few.

The Budget is backfiring on the Chancellor. In the past, commentators have praised the Chancellor, but now the Financial Times is saying that he is skating on thin ice. It is no wonder that the Chancellor has to resort to calling commentators, whom he has praised in the past, teenage scribblers anxious for a quick headline.

Let us examine the impact of the Budget on families. We know that 7 million people on supplementary and other benefits did not benefit from the Budget and, in March and April, many of them experienced social security cuts. About 2 million people thought they were getting a 2p in the pound tax cut, but eventually they discovered that because their tax cut was followed by the withdrawal of housing benefit or family credit they ended up no better off and are facing large price rises as a result of Government decisions.

We know that the average extra bill for people who are paying mortgages is likely to be about £3 to £4 a week—for first-time buyers £4 to £5 a week—if mortgage rates go up by 1 per cent., as the Chancellor appeared to be predicting last week. On top of that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) said at Question Time, ordinary families face price rises for electricity of 11 per cent., for water of 10 per cent., for prescriptions of 8 per cent., for rents of 11 per cent., for gas of 6 per cent.—and now there are charges for eye tests and dental check-ups, too. Almost every benefit that low-income families might have expected from the Budget has been wiped out by the price and mortgage rises that are on the way.

A home owner in my constituency on an average wage who has just bought a house on a high mortgage faces a large increase in his weekly payments. On top of the price rises that he must pay for electricity and everything else, he finds himself worse off even if he has had a £4 a week tax cut in his pay packet this month.

That is why we calculate that the Budget, which was to give a £6 billion handout, which was claimed to be the Budget for everyone and from which all families were going to benefit, has now, after the social security changes, the mortgage rises, and the freezing of child benefit, left 1 million families more than £4 a week worse off, 3 million families more than £2 a week worse off, and 9 million families will have lost money after the post-Budget clawback in price rises and mortgage increases. Large numbers of families will gain about £1 or £2 after the tax changes, but they will find that price rises in the family budget for electricity and everything else will wipe out that gain.

We started with a Budget that promised a £6 billion annual giveaway. It succeeded, however, in making millions of people worse off as a result of social security changes, price rises and mortgage rises. Interest rates have risen five times in the past month, which has started to damage British industry. These are not the marks of the most successful Chancellor since the war, as Conservative Members might like to think, but of a failed Chancellor who is now seen to be guilty of mistaken policies that are backfiring on the Government and on millions of people in this country.

If the objective was to ease the credit boom, to attack inflation and to help our balance of payments, if, having decided that there was an imbalance between investment and consumption, the aim was to help investment and aid the regions most in need, where there are underused resources, a proper Budget would have been an investment Budget. It would have invested in the Health Service, which was the one issue that almost everyone agreed should have been the Budget's first priority. The Budget should have invested in education and the rest of the public services.

No matter what the Chief Secretary produces this or any other afternoon, as a nation we still invest less as a share of our national income in ourselves than any other industrialised country, with the exception of Belgium. We invest a lower share of the national income in ourselves than countries with which the Chief Secretary would not want to compare us—Spain, Turkey, Greece and Portugal.

I emphasise the scale of underinvestment in British manufacturing industry and public services. If, with all the oil resources that we have enjoyed since 1979, we had invested at the same level as Japan, our assets today would have been £350 billion more than they are. If we had invested at the same level as Germany, they would have been £100 billion more. If we had invested at the same level as the much-criticised last Labour Government, investment over the past nine years would have been £50 billion more. Instead, we have wasted a once-for-all opportunity from North sea oil and the taxation it yields to invest properly in our public services, in education and health, in our infrastructure, in industries and technology, in research and development, and in science and innovation. All those are vital to our future.

One of the results of our failure to invest, apart from the high pound and high interest rates, is our worsening balance of payments deficit, not only in our traditional industries but in high technology industries. The Chancellor had the choice between investing in the Health Service and social services, but his priority, like that of the Conservative party, has always been to give to those who already have, even if that means making millions of people worse off.

Let me tell the Chief Secretary how much he and the Government have given the top 1 per cent. since 1979. The Government looked at the plight of the top 1 per cent. just before Budget day. It was not enough for them that they had reduced top rate taxes by 23 per cent. in the first Budget, that top rate thresholds had been raised, that capital gains exemptions had been given, that capital transfer tax had been abolished, or that tax loopholes had been opened up in so many ways. The cumulative effect of tax cuts since 1979 for people in the top 1 per cent. was to give them an extra £10,000 a year in tax cuts alone, £100,000 in total or £200 a week. That was by way of a gift from the Government, and it was more than most people are paid in a week merely as tax cuts.

But this was not enough for the Government. They looked at the problems of the top 1 per cent. and found that they were earning, on average, £75,000 a year. The Treasury computer showed that they would increase their incomes by 13 per cent., that they would do for themselves everything that they wanted to deny their work forces and that they would still enjoy enormous perks. Having seen all that, the Treasury decided to give this group an extra £10,000 a year, on top of the £100,000 that it had already received since 1979. There has been no evidence since the Budget that this group of people has worked harder. I saw no evidence of cancellations at Henley, Wimbledon or Ascot, or of cancellations of holidays in far-off places so that those people could work harder. There is no evidence that this group is more productive, hard-working or industrious, but there is evidence that they are wealthier as a result of what the Chancellor has done.

We are told that those people need an incentive to work harder. We also hear the argument, produced by the Chief Secretary this afternoon, that tax reductions on unearned income are essential so that people invest. However, we know that the record of investment in our manufacturing industry is very poor—even with the top-rate tax cuts made immediately after the Government came into office in 1979. There is no study to which either the Chancellor or the Financial Secretary—hard though he tries—can point to prove that tax cuts are necessary for incentives.

The need for incentives to make people work harder does not explain why the Government have given £200 million in tax relief to those whose pre-1982 capital gains tax liability has been wiped out. The need to work harder cannot justify the £235 million in tax relief for those who inherit—[Interruption.] The Chief Secretary had better keep quiet about the number of hon. Members who are asleep during speeches from the Front Bench. I counted the former Leader of the House, the Conservative Chief Whip and the chairman of the Conservative party, and perhaps the Chief Secretary's PPS will tell us that he was asleep as well.

Mr. Major: As it happens, my hon. Friends were lost in wonder, but it is a matter of fact that the hon. Members for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) and for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) were both enjoying a gentle doze while the hon. Gentleman was speaking. [Interruption.]

Mr. Brown: My hon. Friends deny it. I must say, however, that the Chief Secretary's intervention is on a par with his intervention in a previous debate when he talked about Woman's Own. We expect major statements from the right hon. Gentleman, who has been much advertised as the coming star in the Government, but when he rises to speak it is merely to tell us that one or two people in the Chamber are not awake. He will be hoping that the Prime Minister does not read the Hansard report of this debate, in case the invitation to Chequers is withdrawn.

The need for incentives does not explain why the self-employed, for example, are able to pay their tax on last year's earnings at rates decided for this year. The Chief Secretary has also been unable to explain why £700 million has been given in tax cuts on the unearned income of the top 1 per cent. who are already extremely rich. Much as he tries, he cannot explain what justification there was in the Chancellor's mind for denying pensioners housing benefit, freezing child benefit and introducing a social fund to replace single payments, all at a cost of £700 million, and then handing that over to the people at the top.

The results are beginning to be seen. I telephoned my social security offices a few days ago to ask what had happened as a result of the implementation of the social fund. The office was able to tell me that while the top 1 per cent. are walking away with an average of £10,000 a year in tax cuts, of the applications made for help from the social fund—to help pay, for example, for heating or for journeys that had to be undertaken—one third, 166, had been turned down in the first two months. They had been turned down because the office had said that they were not priorities, because there was not enough money in the social fund budget to justify the payments or because the applicants would not be able to repay the loans from their meagre supplementary benefits. How can the Chief Secretary justify circumstances in which people are not even given the basic dignity of help with key requirements such as heating, food and clothing, while the top 1 per cent. are given £700 million in tax relief on unearned income?

We were told at the beginning that the Budget was a Budget for all. That was revised, and we were then told that it was a Budget for the meritocracy. Then, when we found that the scientists, engineers, researchers and doctors were not such great beneficiaries, we learned the truth. It is a Budget fuelled by selective generosity towards the very rich. It is motivated not by academic theories such as supply-side economics or trickle-down theory, but by greed dressed up as ideology: greed to reward those who already have a great deal by denying to many millions money that they desperately need.

We know that the Government are prepared to ignore the evidence of the churches and other organisations that tell them about the growing gap between rich and poor and the social polarisation in our communities. We know that they are prepared to ignore the warnings of Conservative Back Benchers who ask for a change of course. We also know that they may try to ignore even their own Cabinet members. The Prime Minister is blind to the warnings of the Foreign Secretary, who spoke at Christmas of the danger that social tensions would be exacerbated, and said that the Government still had a long way to go in tackling them.

The Government may ignore the warnings of the Home Secretary, who has said that there is a danger to social cohesion in our communities as a result of the policies being pursued. They have, of course, ignored the warnings of the former Deputy Prime Minister in another place, who said that a little more compassion was needed. But they cannot continue to ignore the warnings of the general public, who in survey after survey show that they are not the narrow, blindly acquisitive, self-seeking individualists that the Prime Minister and her Ministers would have them be. They see the injustice of great economic inequality. They appreciate the contrast in a Budget and Finance Bill that give £2 billion to the rich and at the same time freeze child benefit, cut housing benefit, introduce charges for eye tests and dental check-ups, and push people into having to pay much higher mortgage rates. They also appreciate the waste, inefficiency and, now, incompetence with which the economy is being managed, so that, with interest rates and mortgage rates rising, the gains from the Budget are already being wiped out.

Because the Budget has backfired on the Chancellor, this is a bad Bill which no number of new, good clauses could make into a better Bill. The House should reject it and everything for which it stands.

5.47 pm

Mr. John Biffen (Shropshire, North): The impresarios of the debate are to be congratulated. Rather than being scheduled in the narrow terms of a conventional Third Reading, the debate gives us the opportunity for a wider judgment on the economy. I should like to take advantage of that and make two quick preliminary points before turning to the one matter of substance with which I wish to detain the House.

My first point takes account of the fact that economic and Treasury affairs are a seamless robe, never ending. We are having this debate on the self-same day on which I understand that the Cabinet went through its process of determining public expenditure levels and targets for the coming year. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary will go forth reinforced by that discussion and armed with his meat cleaver, and purport to be a surgeon.

I should like to give a kindly word of advice about the public expenditure task that my right hon. Friend will be attempting as it relates to the National Health Service. He clearly has a major task in terms of his responsibility for public spending, but he also has a political task: to have a well-ordered sense of priorities, and not to view every spending Minister as potentially on the other side. As has already been said, his welcome and deserved ascent in his ministerial career will put him in charge of great spending responsibilities, and he would therefore be well advised to show a little delicacy, particularly in his approach to the National Health Service.

What I have in mind—this was touched on earlier this afternoon—is what may turn out to be the full cost of the increase in nurses' and related grades' salaries and, above all, the regrading that will be associated with that. It is a matter of some complexity which has meant that, from the outset, there could never be a precise figure, but only an estimate. If that outturn proves to be significantly higher than the estimate of the review board, and clearly beyond what is within the capacity of the area health authorities to master, it should be treated by him with the generosity which we know he has in private life, and which sound political judgment would also commend. I hope that my right hon. Friend will take those fraternal greetings from a former Chief Secretary, who, I might say, has never quite recovered from the experience, and that he will prove to be a good ally to the National Health Service in the discussions that lie ahead.

The second modest point with which I should like to detain the House for a moment is that reiterated by my right hon. Friend when he said that he was looking forward to an income tax rate of 20p in the pound. That objective is quite heroic and is certainly attainable, but it implies certain suppositions that should be shared with the House. The Treasury is forecasting a modest drop in the rate of economic growth. That does not come as a great surprise. I am assuming, therefore, that we may take as a starting point for the rest of this Parliament a rate of economic growth that is not merely a straight-line projection from the recent past. In other words, growth alone will not necessarily deliver the resources for that kind of tax change.

I am also assuming that there will be a certain political wisdom which will assume that public spending must be judged on its own merits and, in certain directions, will necessitate further increases, although I would be on the side of those seeking to obtain as much general economy as possible. However, I am assuming that there will not be great retrenchment in public spending to enable that change to come about. It is just possible, therefore, that it may come about as a result of a redirection of our tax balance so that it relates more to one's capacity in spending than it does to earning.

As a general proposition that may excite some anxiety, but the anxiety that it properly engenders is whether we will be the arbiters in that, or whether we will find that the value added tax that would lie at the heart of any such switch will be determined, not in this House, but elsewhere. The European Court indicated, over a relatively modest range of activities, what were to be our VAT rates. It is an open debate whether 1992 and the single market require a single pattern of VAT, uniform across the Community, or whether the sovereign nation states will still be given options on VAT and the House of Commons will remain supreme in those fiscal affairs.

I do not travel very hopefully. If the House is anxious to maintain its supremacy in those matters it will have to act with the utmost vigilance and it will, from the very outset, have to have much clearer understandings from the Government than hitherto about their overall views on VAT. That is of particular relevance when one considers the objective of a 20p in the pound rate of income tax. Tax switching will be central to that decision.

I wish to deal now with the one point of substance that I want to raise. It relates to clauses 23 and 24 and the major tax changes referred to by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary and the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). I wish to relate those changes, which have certainly added to immediate purchasing power, to the inflationary pressure that could be perceived at the time of the Budget. Iain Macleod used to say that Budgets look very different after 24 hours. That was certainly true with regard to presentation. He said that of Labour Budgets. I am merely trying to be generous to both sides of the House.

Four months have now passed between the Budget and Third Reading this evening. The three specific indicators of an inflationary pressure are worth recalling and putting on record. Bank lending, which, in mid-March, showed an annual increase of 20 per cent., has now increased to 27 per cent. United Kingdom house prices, which showed an annual increase of 16 per cent., have now increased to 19 per cent. The annual earnings increase, which was 8·5 per cent., is at approximately the same level. Although figures for labour shortage cannot easily be identified, the Association of British Chambers of Commerce has just produced a regional survey which shows that the developing labour shortage is, if anything, sharper than it was a few months ago.

Those are statistics. They do not compel a conclusion, but they cannot easily or lightly be disregarded. However, there is one new factor to be added to anxieties about the extent of tightness or overheating in the economy, and that is the trade balance. When we debated the Budget we heard a Treasury forecast of £4,000 million on the current account as the expected deficit. After about five months of the year we know that the figure is already in excess of that, at £4,700 million, and that the figure for May, £1,705 million, is the largest current deficit ever recorded. Some of that may be explained by the restocking of raw materials and capital goods associated with an expanding economy and some of it can obviously be related to very strong demand in the high street. However, I find it extraordinary that the Treasury could come out with a figure of just £4 billion when that figure has now been overtaken on such a massive scale in so short a time.

If we take either of those factors—restocking because of the so-called boom or high-street purchasing—the Treasury was not making the appropriate analysis when it produced that figure. That statistic alone, when added to the others that I have mentioned, gives rise to a wholly legitimate anxiety which is in no way intended to undermine the respect and admiration for many of the major tax reforms that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his team have produced in the Budget and the Finance Bill.

Given those figures of incipient and perceived demand now growing in the economy, it is a matter for judgment whether the tax cuts erred on the side, not merely of generosity, but of wantonness. That question looks a good deal more uncomfortable today than it did four months ago.

5.59 pm

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): I noted that when the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) was praising the Chief Secretary, he paused for a moment. It is probable that the Chief Secretary thought that if the Prime Minister read praise of him from that quarter it might impede his so far rapid rise in her favour.

We have said from the time that the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced the Budget that it is one of contrasts. This is not a time of crisis for the United Kingdom generally, but many individuals are facing great personal difficulties. There is the unfairness of tax cuts for those who are at the top end of the income scale and of benefit cuts for those who are at the bottom of the income scale, or who have no income at all. The Government are happy to tighten the screw on those who have little or nothing, while being generous to those who have done well, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) said. Payments are being tightened for those who have to claim benefit, but, in the operation of the business expansion scheme, the Government are happy to enter into open-ended commitments for those who would seek to use tax breaks to provide accommodation for those who are at the bottom end of the income scale.

As I understand it, the Government's primary aim is to ensure that inflation is kept under control. The Government say, rightly, that inflation has dire effects, especially on those—they do not accept this—who will lose as a result of the Budget and the Bill. I am talking about those who will not enjoy the tax breaks that we have been discussing.

The majority regard a house as the provision of a roof over their head rather than an investment, and the position that this majority faces is grave in both the purchasing and rented sectors. It has been said that tax cuts are inflationary, and we know that house prices are escalating. We are told that house prices add about 0·4 per cent. to the retail prices index. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer was discussing inflation this afternoon, we were astonished when he distinguished two sorts of inflation. He said that the inflation of house prices did not really matter—at least, he could not control it—and that the other form of inflation that he could control was the one that mattered. That will come as news to those who buy houses or those who have to rent houses. To those people, the increase in prices is very much part of the inflationary package with which they have to deal.

There is a credit boom. We are told that there is £1 billion more credit this year than last year. However, there are many who are finding it difficult to make ends meet. They have to borrow more and more to ensure that they have a roof over their head, not because they desire to increase their spending or to improve their standard of living, although that is without doubt the motivation in some instances. Yesterday, on Report, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) said that he regarded a house as a sterile asset. That is the hon. Gentleman's approach, but most people buy a house because they need it, not because they want to invest in a house as opposed to some other asset.

The plight of the first-time buyer is grave. There are escalating house prices for those who want to buy and escalating rents for those who want to rent, especially in the south-east of England and certain other areas. No tax relief is given to those who seek to rent. Why should not the same relief be given to those who want to buy and to those who want to rent? Sometimes it makes good economic sense to rent, especially at the beginning of a person's working life or when he has retired. Instead, we choose to give blanket mortgage tax relief whatever the individual's circumstances, subject to minor restrictions.

The Nationwide Anglia building society's latest survey shows that a three-bedroomed house in Haringey costs £113,000. The top prices in five London boroughs for a three-bedroomed house are all over £100,000. An equivalent house in Aberdeen would cost £50,000 and in Edinburgh £46,000. In Edinburgh, where I live, there are flats retailing in the new town for over £200,000 that would have cost £20,000 or £30,000 only seven or eight years ago. I read a speculative article in The Sunday Times this weekend, that the Government might be considering a form of capital tax on gains made through the sale of houses. There are many who would not understand that proposal. The Government would be taxing an inflationary increase that has been brought about through no fault, in most instances, of the owner of a house.

The Government will have to address themselves to rising house prices. There are many, especially those who are seeking to buy a house of their own for the first time, who are being priced out of the market. I suspect that the majority of hon. Members are living in houses that they have bought and lived in for some time. Alternatively, they are in their third, fourth, fifth or sixth house. We must bear in mind those who are leaving home and seeking accommodation for the first time, whether rented or purchased. Such people are facing an extremely difficult task. It is ridiculous for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that house price inflation has nothing to do with the Government and that there is nothing that they can do about it.

The Government could restrict mortgage tax relief to first-time buyers, and give similar relief to those who seek to rent for the first time. The Government could adjust their regional policy to ensure that industrial development is not concentrated in the south-east of England and that inflationary pressures are not built up in the area. The Government, through the Ministry of Defence, are a large employer. They could act to ensure that decentralisation works. Most defence installations are in the north, but most of those who run them seem to need to live in the south. I do not understand why that should be so. Some of the commanding officers and some of the high-ranking civil servants could be told that, while it is handy to visit Harrods every now and again, it is not necessary for the defence of Britain that they should do so.

Increases in interest rates are accompanied by increases in house prices. Interest rates are increasing. This is a mechanism to dampen down the credit that the Government have fuelled by tax cuts. Interest rates have increased on five occasions in the past few weeks. I suppose that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would argue that this is fine tuning. He lambasted my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), the Labour Government's Chancellor of the Exchequer, for regular fine tuning, but that is exactly what he is doing now. It seems to be all right now.

Inflation is being stoked up, and it is hitting those on low incomes about whom the Prime Minister claims to be concerned. These people have been hit extremely hard by Government policies over the past few years. I am talking of those who have no choice, those who cannot afford to choose whether to send their children to a private school or to a state school, those who cannot choose whether to live in one house rather than another, those who have to choose whether to eat or to heat their homes. These are the people who have been hammered by the inflation that the Government are fuelling.

We complain about the Budget and criticise its unfairness, but those who will pay the price of the tax cuts in income forgone and in the inflation that the cuts will create will be acutely aware of the unfairness. It is all very well to help those who have been helped already, but the Government must realise that in the coming months they will have to increase public expenditure to ensure that those at the lower end of the income scale are helped. They must understand also that they will have to take action to ameliorate the inflationary pressures that will hit especially hard those who usually bear the brunt of them.

An obvious consequence of inflationary pressures is debt. Interest charges are crucial to industry, and they are important also to individuals. The amount of indebtedness is increasing. The consumer credit boom means that more and more people are getting into debt. Many of those at the lower end of the income scale incur debt through necessity, not because they wish to obtain credit or to act imprudently.

The Chief Secretary gave us the view from the golf club, as it were, of lush green pastures and everyone doing extremely well. That is the view of the member of the golf club with a gin and tonic in his hand. Contrast that view with the reality of one of my constituents who is unemployed—she is in receipt of income support—and who recently applied for a grant from the social fund after having her first child. She was not offered a grant. Instead, she was offered a loan of £100, which she had to repay at £10 a week. That was somebody who was living on income support. The House must be aware that some people who are convicted in our courts and fined £100 pay such fines at £3 or £4 a week, yet the DHSS asked that young lady to repay her loan of £100 at £10 a week. That is an utter disgrace.

When we hear the Chief Secretary extolling the Budget's virtues, let us remember those who do not know the world that we heard talked about and who are the very people who will suffer from the inflationary pressures that the Government are stoking up. It is all very well for the Government to say that the economy is in good heart and there is nothing to worry about. The fact of the matter is that an increasingly large section of the population has everything to worry and despair about. It is clear that at present the Government do not seem to want to know. Unfortunately, the number of people who are feeling the wrong end of the Government's policies is growing day by day. That is a real tragedy and it is for that, if for no other reason, that the Budget will be remembered.

6.10 pm

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) began his speech by remarking on the absence from our proceedings of any Member of the Social and Liberal Democratic party or the Social Democratic party. That absence is continuing.

At the outset of his remarks the hon. Gentleman also said that this was the most controversial Finance Bill since the war. That opinion does not seem to have been shared by those who served, as I did not, on the Standing Committee that considered the Bill. Indeed, it is a strange truth that the amount of time spent considering the Bill in Committee was the shortest for any Finance Bill since the war.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I am sure the hon. Gentleman will freely acknowledge that the Bill was debated for more days than ever before, because the Opposition sought to fight this controversial measure topic by topic.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): Press release by press release.

Mr. Brown: Perhaps, as the hon. Gentleman says, press release by press release. It is not the amount of words that were spoken on a topic that is significant, but their effect.

Mr. Gow: My point is legitimate. If this was indeed the most controversial Finance Bill since the war, many would have expected the Opposition to fight it continuously and persistently over a long period. In fact, the total amount of time spent debating the Finance Bill in Committee this year was 62 hours and 30 minutes. On five occasions the Committee rose before 8 o'clock. That total number of hours is inconsistent with the view——

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): Will the hon. Gentleman reflect on the fact that the majority of Labour Members who were present throughout the proceedings in Committee that considered the Bill are present now opposing the Bill, whereas those Conservative Members who served on the Committee are not present in the Chamber to defend it?

Mr. Gow: That is a different point from the one that I was making. I was making the legitimate comment, in contradistinction to the assertions by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East, that in reality only 62 hours and 30 minutes were spent debating the Bill in Committee, despite the Opposition's claim that it is the most controversial since the war. He did not say that it was the most controversial since my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister arrived at Downing street. His assertion was that it was the most controversial since the war.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The hon. Gentleman is being unfair. At the beginning of the Bill's proceedings we fought hard to obtain an agreement with the Government so that we could conduct our proceedings in such a way that we had a measured political debate rather than a war of attrition. That was our choice. The Opposition's hostility cannot be measured in the crude way that the hon. Gentleman seeks to suggest. If the hon. Gentleman is urging us to return to the old way, I can assure him that my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), and others, will be more than willing to do so. If that is his foolish suggestion, I do not think that he will have the Government's support.

Mr. Gow: One can always tell in this place when an arrow has reached its target.

I leave that preliminary point to deal with two aspects of the wider issue of our economic policy and the Government's policy as reflected in the Finance Bill. I want to consider two aspects of inflation, which was the subject to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) devoted his speech.

I want to look, first, at the phenomenon of rising house prices. They are rising fast in the south-east, but they are probably also rising in almost every other part of the kingdom. That phenomenon has been taking place for some years, but with an acceleration during the past 24 months.

The first point that needs to be made is that rising house prices do not cause inflation. It is inflation, or incipient inflation, that is one possible cause of rising house prices, but there is another possible cause of rising house prices, and that is a definite choice made by the British people between supply and demand and between one area of investment and another.

Ms. Armstrong: Nonsense.

Mr. Gow: Of couse, that arouses great hostility among Opposition Members. They still believe that wet pavements cause rain, and that is not the truth.

I want to develop the point, because there is one sure way in which we can reduce the rate at which house prices rise, and that is to increase the supply of houses. That is the best way in which the Government can act. The Government have no control over the value that the British people wish to place on one capital asset as opposed to another.

Ms. Armstrong: Of course they do.

Mr. Gow: It is not surprising that the hon. Lady is becoming agitated. I am about to explain to her a truth that the Opposition have never understood. Since 1979, precisely because of the policies that have rightly been followed by the Government, there has been an increasing desire among people to own their own homes, and over 2·1 million more people are home owners today than was the case in May 1979. Where there is an increase in demand and an increasing awareness among fellow countrymen of the attainability of home ownership, the increase in demand will be reflected in an increase in prices.

Ms. Armstrong: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gow: I shall give way to every Opposition Member, whenever he or she seeks to intervene.

Ms. Armstrong: I understand why the hon. Gentleman needs to give way. There are no other Conservative Members here to speak. The hon. Gentleman is a long-standing Member and I am a new Member. The macho idea that the late hour that one stays up is a measure of one's resistance to a Bill is rather peculiar.

The reality of house prices is that in areas such as mine there are plenty of houses for sale. In bricks and mortar terms they are good houses, but we have a declining population because of the Government's economic policy. More people want to buy houses in the south-east than in the north-east, not because of the supply of houses, but because of economic inequalities and overheating in the south-east and a lack of economic growth in the north-east.

Mr. Gow: I have exciting news for the hon. Lady. Some of the houses which she says are presently empty will shortly become occupied. If there are unoccupied houses in her constituency and house prices in the south-east continue to rise dramatically, a growing number of employers and employees will realise the economic advantages of moving the area of their activities away from the south-east. That will happen.

Mr. Wilshire: It is already happening.

Mr. Gow: My hon. Friend does not disagree with me.

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): We are already seeing clear evidence of that in Manchester and in the north-west of England. Employers and individuals are moving up from the south to where houses are affordable and jobs are available.

Mr. Gow: Of course, and in the case of my hon. Friend's constituency there is the added attraction of having him as its Member of Parliament, which is an advantage not conferred upon the constituency of the hon. Member for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong).

Although that is the case, and two of my hon. Friends have asserted that what I have predicted is already occurring, I must tell my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary that there is another way—apart from the normal laws of the market—in which we can meet that demand. I still believe that we are too restrictive in our planning controls and that the amount of time taken between making an application for planning permission and the application being granted—especially where the appellant procedures have to be gone through—is too long.

I wish to move on from the question of house prices, which, I repeat, are not a cause for inflation, to a wider issue about inflation. I remind the House of what my right hon. Friend said in his Budget statement:

> "The medium-term financial strategy, now entering its ninth year, which continue to provide the framework for reducing the growth of money GDP, and hence inflation . . . These will be achieved by maintaining firm monetary discipline, buttressed by a prudent fiscal stance."—[Official Report, 15 March 1988; Vol. 129, c. 997.]

I am in wholehearted agreement with that statement of the Government's objectives and the way in which diminished inflation should be achieved. I find myself in respectful disagreement with my right hon. Friend's decision five months ago to reduce interest rates, and I find myself in respectful agreement with his decision, taken in the last six weeks, to increase interest rates on five separate occasions —each by 0·5 per cent. My right hon. Friend was right to say that this year there will be a repayment of debt. Zero Government borrowing and, a fortiori, a repayment of debt will bring downward pressure on inflation. The other weapon in the hands of the Chancellor is to maintain interest rates at such a level that monetary growth is contained.

When Parliament met in May 1979, the most important danger facing the economy was inflation. Today, it is perceived that that danger is there no longer. I cannot agree with those who are complacent about the prospects for inflation. If it was possible for the Government to reduce inflation from its 1979 level to its present level of 4 per cent., it is most certainly possible for the Government to bring inflation down to zero, which is the declared policy of the Chancellor and the Prime Minister. I hope that the Government will give a higher priority to the abatement of inflation and that my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will say in his reply that the Government's aim is to have stable prices—that is to say, zero inflation—by the end of this Parliament. Stable prices will be the surest guarantee of fuller employment and of faster economic growth in the long term. The condition both for fuller employment and for accelerating economic growth is stable prices. I hope that my right hon. Friend will recommit the Government to that.

6.26 pm

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow). I feel tempted to reflect that when all around him have gone he will remain standing as the last free marketeer. Having listened to the hon. Gentleman, many hon. Members will have gained the impression that the British people have been subjected to a great experiment, which has been variously labelled in the past few years—sometimes as monetarism, sometimes as the social market economy and now, perhaps more plainly, as the tax-cutting Budget.

I believe that the Government are inviting the people of this country to worship at the altar of the free market on which stands the idol of the atavistic individual. The latest high priest of this ideology is a young assistant professor of economics at Harvard, Lawrence Lindsey, who is regularly referred to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He was a member of President Reagan's Council of Economic Advisers in 1983 and 1984. Some of us fear—probably even the Government do—that our economy lives in fear of the debt in the American economy, despite advice from such as Mr. Lindsey. Mr. Lindsey has been proclaimed as one of the gurus of the American supply side economists. He is a strong advocate of tax cuts to encourage the sort of social mobility that the Chief Secretary referred to today. Professor Lindsey argues that cuts in higher tax rates would come through in extra tax revenues to the national economy.

The Chancellor boasted in his Budget speech:

"Throughout my time as Chancellor I have been on the lookout for taxes to abolish."—[Official Report, 15 March 1988; Vol. 129, c. 1003.]

He then went on to abolish two minor capital taxes on share transactions, which was a little piece of self-indulgence amounting to £100 million. Some of us will note that that was almost as much as the amount by which the Chancellor claimed he could not afford to increase child benefit this year. It is now rumoured that child benefit will be phased out altogether, but the Chancellor still boasts that he will abolish income tax altogether. How does the Budget's approach match the simple Lawrence Lindsey test? On 23 May the Financial Secretary said that if the tax regime for 1988-89 was still the same as that which existed in 1978-79, some £20,000 million more would have been paid this year than under the current Budget's arrangements. In other words, the Budget markedly fails the simple Lawrence Lindsey test.

In a piece written for the Sunday Times of 20 March this year, Lindsey said:

"In the estimates I did at the National Bureau of Economic Research, the 'supply-side' effect of the 1981 tax cuts probably added about 2·5 per cent. to America's GNP over the first five years they were in effect. That works out to about 0·5 per cent. per year, nobody's idea of a miracle."

Some, I am sure, would argue that the impact of 0·5 per cent. is so marginal that it could be interpreted as meaning Professor Lindsey does not know what the effects of the policy are. It would, as my hon. Friends have said, perhaps be much better for the Government to have a strategy on interest rates for individuals, companies and industry in order to get real growth in the economy, because Lindsey will prove to be a false prophet followed by a Government casting around for reinforcement of their preconceived ideas.

Of that £20,000 million reduction in tax liabilities, no less than 46 per cent.—that is £9,300 million—is now being enjoyed by the top 10 per cent. of taxpayers. Looked at from another angle, the top 1 per cent. of taxpayers have had their tax liabilities reduced by £22,680 each, whereas the bottom 50 per cent. have had reductions averaging £3·30 each. Some of the lowest income earners—as I know, and as other hon. Members know from their advice surgeries—are paying more in tax now as a result of the operation of this Budget.

Lindsey went on to say:

"Patience may be sorely tried"

by the approach of his strategy.

"Data will no doubt be produced showing that the measured income distribution has become less equal."

Of course it has. Data are emerging daily, through careful interrogation by our parliamentary questions, both of the Budget impact and of the operation of the social security system, which show that, while the very rich are getting richer, the poor are getting poorer. It is clear that for the most part pensioners, in particular, low-wage families and single homeless people are receiving less in social security than they were before 1 April of this year. If the Government had held, for example, to the previous method of pegging the basic pension level at the level of inflation, or the level of average earnings increase, whichever was the higher, a pensioner couple would now be getting £79·90 a week instead of the £69·50 that they receive under the present arrangement. To that has to be added the cuts that have taken place in housing benefit.

I was somewhat surprised to hear Government Members refer in Committee to statutory pension payments as "handouts" to pensioners. It is an insult to pensioners to suggest that they live on handouts, when they have worked all their lives, have paid in to the national insurance system and have a right to a decent income when they retire. Many Conservative Members did not seem to realise that all people receiving housing benefit have to pay 20 per cent. of their housing costs because of the statutory rate contribution that was imposed in April of this year, regardless of ability to pay.

I refer to the Government's admission on 27 May that families in Coventry earning between £60 and £120 a week, with two children, wound up between £5 and nearly £11 a week worse off as a result of this Budget. That was because, although the introduction of the new credit benefit was raising entitlement by some £10 to £13 a week over the previous system, that raising of the family credit was offset by the loss of free school meals and free milk. It amounted to just over £4 a week, and in some families there were cuts of between £15 and £16 a week. Those are not our figures. They were given in replies to questions put to the Minister.

It sometimes strikes us as absolutely astounding that the Prime Minister can come to the House at Question Time and say that everyone is participating in the prosperity of Britain, because we know that people have been pushed to the margins of our society and are not participating in that wealth. Some of the poor are getting much poorer. Claims by the Government, such as we have heard this evening, to have removed restraints to growth and given free rein to competition, and about the success of the privatisation programme, emerge as shibboleths at the altar of the free market. Under this Government's economic policies millions are now being excluded from the wealth that the Chancellor of the Exchequer proclaims.

In practice, the economic policies are fostering what some might describe as a social malignancy, the "loadsamoney" culture, in which the poor are priced out to the margins of our society, while the rich in the city centres get richer and richer. The people of this country, unlike, it seems, the Government, know that economic justice is at the heart of social growth and that people ought to be at the core of the economy, not an arithmetical equation or the idol of the free market. That is why in the weeks and months to come this Budget will be clearly understood by the people for what it is. That is why the great experiment that has been tried once again in this Budget will, as my hon. Friends have said, eventually blow up in the Government's face.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): It is a happy coincidence that the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) has tried to focus the attention of the House upon worshipping at the altar, because it is the theological overtones that opposition to this Bill has attracted that I want to refer to this evening.

Despite the fact that the Bill has 170 pages packed full of detail, it seems to me that its key issue is the principles that lie behind the tax reductions. These principles, I have no hesitation in saying, are absolutely right, despite all the nonsense that we hear from the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Battle: The hon. Member throws out the remark that it is nonsense coming from these Benches. Does he include in that the reference to his own Government Ministers' answers to our questions?

Mr. Wilshire: No. I am focusing on the criticism that I have heard here today, the criticism that I have heard before and, particularly, the criticism that has come from outside the House about a splendid Budget and a very splendid Bill.

All the criticism that I have heard, particularly from outside and particularly from the Labour party, is quite unjustified. I have tried to sort it in my mind and have come to the conclusion that the sources of criticism can be put into two groups. The first of these groups is the envious, bitter politicians, and the second is the "holier than thou" clerics. Sadly, as I try to sort out the distinction between these groups it becomes ever more blurred. The joint message that I increasingly hear seems to be something like this: that God has joined the Labour party and all Conservatives are now banished to the everlasting bonfire.

This Third Reading debate seems to me to be the ideal time to reaffirm the philosophy that underpins these proposals. It is not greed, as Opposition Members keep saying. Opposition Members would do the country a favour if they tried to learn these basic principles, because then they might be some good to the country.

The principles seem to me to be these: that wealth must be created before hon. Gentlemen can spend it or redistribute it; that the state cannot create that wealth—all it can do is provide the right climate for individuals to create it for themselves; and that capitalism is the best system yet devised for enabling individuals to create that wealth. This Bill is all about creating that right climate so that all of us may prosper.

Ms. Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there is an enormous amount of money available to the Government from their privatisation receipts, oil revenues and so on, that they could spend for the benefit of the country? Why do they refuse to spend it?

Mr. Wilshire: I was referring to the fact that it is individuals who create wealth. I want to discuss what individuals should do with that wealth. They should not simply leave it to the Government to do things on their behalf. If we follow the principles and the Bill is accepted, we will all be better off. That will enable all of us to do more to help those less fortunate than ourselves.

What should we make of the joint criticism that the Bill has received, particularly the criticism from Socialist politicians and trendy clerics? Their approach is politically stupid.

Mr. Darling: Would the hon. Gentleman care to name the trendy clerics he is disparaging?

Mr. Wilshire: That is what I intend to do. I am grateful for being given an opportunity to do that.

The joint approach is politically stupid because Opposition Members and those who support them seem to have failed to learn the lessor from three election defeats. They have not managed to take on board the message of the current opinion polls.

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): May I remind the hon. Gentleman that he has not yet mentioned the trendy clerics?

Mr. Wilshire: That is a surprise that I shall spin out for a moment. I want to whet Opposition Members' appetites. —[Interruption.] It ill becomes Opposition Members to sleep. They were going to sleep before you arrived, Madam Deputy Speaker, when their Front Bench spokesman was making them nod off. Many of them are awake now because they are jumping up and down.

As I have said, the political lesson that the Opposition have failed to learn from their election defeats is that seeking to blame prosperity for social ills will get them nowhere.

Their theological approach is dangerous. It divides a dwindling Church and ignores chunks of the New Testament. All alert students of the utterances of those who advance theological reasons for rejecting the Bill and for opposing the Government will be aware of the trendy cleric to whom I wish to refer. If they have studied carefully, they will have noticed the recent outbursts from this year's Methodist conference. As a Methodist, I am saddened that our new president—bear in mind that our president occupies John Wesley's chair—has joined the growing band of trendy and misguided clerics who oppose the Bill.

In all conscience, if I describe somebody as "misguided", it is only right that I should justify that remark. I shall attempt to do that by using two quotations. The first is from a little tract given to me when I tackled that cleric on what he had said. It is entitled, "A Methodist view of capitalism in Britain today". It is written by the president, the Rev. Richard G. Jones. It says that capitalism

"has no place for the poor, the weak, the sick, those who cannot work".

I quote that to make clear where the president of the Methodist conference stands as an individual. But where does the Methodist Church stand?

Methodism's distinctive contribution to Christianity is to be found in the first four volumes of John Wesley's sermons. Sermon No. 44, published in 1760, is entitled, "The proper use of money." By happy coincidence, that title could easily be the short title of the Finance (No. 2) Bill. The sermon says:

[Mr. Wilshire]

"The right use of money—a subject largely spoken of, after their manner, by men of the world"—

politicians—

"but not sufficiently considered by those whom God hath chosen out of the world"—

clerics.

"These generally do not consider, as the importance of the subject requires, the use of this excellent talent. Neither do they understand how to employ it to the greatest advantage".

John Wesley goes on to say that the introduction of money

"into the world is one admirable instance of the wise and gracious providence of God. It has, indeed, been the manner of poets, orators and philosophers"— and, dare I add, the Labour party—

"in almost all ages and nations, to rail at this"——

Mr. Darling: With respect, this sounds like the Monty Python guide to religion and the Budget. Will the hon. Gentleman say whether he is criticising the view taken by the president of the Methodist conference, who said that under the present system there is no place for the poor or the sick? Is he saying that that is wrong?

Mr. Wilshire: The quotation from John Wesley will show that one has to understand what money is and then understand how to use it.

John Wesley went on:

"It has, indeed, been the manner of poets, orators and philosophers, in almost all ages and nations, to rail at this, as the grand corrupter of the world, the bane of virtue, the pest of human society . . . But is not all this"— railing against money—

"mere empty rant?"

We have heard such rant from Opposition Members.

"Is there any solid reason therein? By no means. For, let the world be as corrupt as it will, is gold or silver to blame?. . .The fault does not lie in the money, but in them that use it . . . It is, therefore, of the highest concern that all those who fear God know how to employ this valuable talent".

Ms. Armstrong: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wilshire: I will give way to another Methodist with pleasure.

Ms. Armstrong: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman looks at last week's edition of The Methodist Recorder where he might see another interpretation of John Wesley's sermon. The hon. Gentleman says that he wishes to give the view of the Methodist Church. The view of the Methodist Church was expressed not just by the president but by the conference. There was one dissenter to that. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was at the debate, but the Methodist conference roundly condemned the Budget, not because it talked about money but because of the way in which it distributed and used that money. In that sense, the Methodist conference was totally in support of John Wesley in that money in itself is not evil; it is the way in which one chooses to use it. We and the Methodist conference want to see that used to support and protect the vulnerable first.

Mr. Wilshire rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have only just returned to the Chamber. This is the Third Reading of the Finance (No. 2) Bill and I suspect that what takes place at Methodist conferences may not be wholly relevant.

Mr. Wilshire: I am desperately sorry, Mr. Speaker, that you did not hear what came before. It is relevant. If you will bear with me, I have to make one final point. The creation of wealth is at the heart of the Bill. Only after creating wealth can one discuss what to do with it.

You are right, Mr. Speaker. I will not discuss the Methodist conference but I want to put on record what John Wesley said because it is at the heart of the Bill. He said:

"It is, therefore, of the highest concern, that all who fear God know how to employ this valuable talent . . . And, perhaps, all the instructions which are necessary for this may be reduced to three plain rules."

The House should take on board those three rules. The first is, "Gain all you can." In other words, it is a good thing to be better off. Secondly, "Save all you can." Despite what we have heard from Opposition Members, investing is encouraged if we take note of that point. Thirdly, "Give all you can." That does not mean encouraging the state to tax people; it means that people should give what they can themselves.

Mr. Worthington: Would the hon. Member quarrel with the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), who referred to the "unacceptable face of capitalism"? Does the hon. Member think that he was being doctrinally unsound?

Mr. Wilshire: The difficulty is to get in touch with him to agree or disagree with him. When I see him here, it is usually in the opposite Lobby.

Having quoted John Wesley at length, with many interruptions, I conclude by saying that I think he would have approved of the Budget and would have been voting in the Aye Lobby tonight. Therefore, I urge all hon. Members to back the Bill because it will help all of us to make more money. [Laughter.] Opposition Members may laugh, but the point has to be understood that there is nothing to be ashamed of in making money.

Mr. Battle: Will the hon. Gentleman explain to the House, as he has so far failed to do in his jibes and slurs on the Methodist Church and his criticisms of the Budget, how a person whose income has been reduced as a result of the Budget and the changes in benefit can spend more money? The people have not got the money to spend because his Government have taken it away.

Mr. Wilshire: The Budget is about creating wealth. The Bill will do precisely that and will give opportunities for everyone, despite what Opposition Members say.

Mr. Alistair Burt (Bury, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that the anger among Opposition Members has arisen because they have not yet found out that the policies of the Government have created wealth for a growing majority of the people? That is why Labour Members sit on the Opposition Benches and we sit on the Government Benches. The Bill will continue that process. Opposition Members are angry because they are still getting it wrong.

Mr. Wilshire: I agree completely. I have always found, when I have been heckled, that it is because the hecklers do not like the argument and cannot think of anything else to say. They claim that the Bill is unjust and unfair. It is not. What would be unfair and unjust would be if individuals who benefited from the Bill turned their backs on those who need help. That represents the issues for the trendy clerics.

My final message is : let all of us in this House support the Bill and help to create more wealth. Then let the clerics in God's House teach all of us as individuals how to use the wealth and how to help other people.

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): In considering the Budget, we should ask ourselves whether it corresponds to the needs that we see in our constituencies. Does it have relevance for the people whom we have the honour to represent? Does it make the choice of priorities that they would make, given the needs that they see around them? In my constituency I have not met anyone who feels that the Budget matches those needs.

Throughout the consideration of the Bill in Committee, we have been acutely conscious of living in one world and of Ministers living in a completely different world. In the world in which many of us have to live, a third of the population of Scotland in my region of Strathclyde are living at or below supplementary benefit level. That proportion is not diminishing; rather it is increasing.

In March 1988, 16·8 per cent. of the people in Strathclyde were unemployed. I am intrigued by the Government's calendar which refers to falling unemployment for the last 23 months. The interesting thing is that it ignores the previous 86 months for which the Government were in control. If we consider unemployment on a fair basis—taking it over the time that the Government have been in control—we note that unemployment in Scotland has gone from 165,000 to 296,000. The unemployment to vacancy ratio is still 20:1.

Since 1979 Strathclyde has lost 200,000 jobs, which is 20 per cent. of all jobs in the region. Strathclyde now employs 3·6 per cent. of the total of British people who are employed; in 1979 it employed 4·4 per cent. There has been a massive proportionate decrease. Since 1979 manufacturing employment in the region has fallen by 47 per cent. When we listen to the Government, it seems that the decline has been reversed, but in the year up to September 1987 a further 11,000 jobs were lost. On present trends the loss of jobs is likely to continue.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, south): Despite the dreary noises, does the hon. Gentleman agree that disposable incomes in Scotland are much higher than in other regions, and are growing rapidly?

Mr. Worthington: I do not agree with that; I shall come to that later.

Large parts of the industrial north and Scotland are projected by the Cambridge Econometrics people to lose 85,000 more jobs by the year 2000. The Budget changes do not help. Poor people have lost money. [Interruption.]

Mr. Battle: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have been here throughout the debate, often in the absence of Government Members who obviously were not prepared to defend their Budget. I am now finding it difficult to hear my hon. Friend's remarks because of the noise being made by the hon. Members who have just rushed into the Chamber.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask hon. Members not to have private conversations.

Mr. Worthington: I am grateful, Mr. Speaker.

The alleged tax cuts and the changes in social security benefit, as well as increases in rents and electricity charges and the 20 per cent. minimum of rates which people have to pay, have affected incomes. In our surgeries we hear a catalogue of woe because of the problems caused by the Government's policies. In addition to all that, from next April people in Scotland will have to pay the poll tax. That means a transfer of resources from the poorer to the richer areas. Also, the uniform business rate is not to be introduced in Scotland until nearer the year 2000 than 1990. Again, in effect, that will lead to a transfer of resources from Scotland.

If one looks around, one has a picture of public squalor. One can see that the roads are inadequately repaired, public buildings are in poor condition and, above all, housing is visibly in disrepair. The reason is not mismanagement by the public sector; the work should be done by the private sector, but it is not being done.

There is a progressive lack of investment in Scotland. Conservative Members pointed out in Committee the growth of the venture capital industry. That is good to see, but, once again, most of that venture capital investment is in the south-east. Sixty per cent. of the growth in venture capital investment has been in the south-east, although it has only 47 per cent. of firms, whereas Scotland has only 6 per cent. of venture capital investment, although it has 12 per cent. of firms. In Scotland, we also have a banking system that is short-sighted about investment. The pattern in Scotland is that lending is done through overdrafts rather than through medium term loans. In the south-east the lending pattern is different.

We have a far from free market in which the Government are stoking up the south-east. It is interesting to note that the M25 was built at a cost of about £980 million, whereas the main road into Scotland, the A74, is not likely to attain motorway status until after the turn of the century.

It is interesting to consider the figures for the London docklands. The budget for the docklands for 1987-88 is £132 million, although the London docklands cover a small area. That budget dwarfs the combined budgets of the Scottish Development Agency and the Highlands and Islands Development Board. The Budget has a pattern, to which I am sure other Opposition Members will refer. The effect of the Budget is to leave more resources in the south than there are in the north and in Scotland.

We hoped that the Budget would help to resist the trend towards the centralisation of resources in the south-east. Is it the inexorable consequence of Government policies that we shall be living in two nations? Will not people in the north and Scotland have the right to live in the same country as those in the south-east? The Opposition believe that, if we are all members of a United Kingdom, there should be comparable standards throughout. The inevitable consequence of Government policies is that people will be paid less and less in the north and Scotland, and more and more in the south. The standard of services in the north and in Scotland will progressively decline.

The Government must recognise the importance of manufacturing industry. We must have long-term investment. The Government have an antipathy to manufacturing industry that is difficult to understand. In Scotland, 23 per cent. of employment is in manufacturing. We are led to believe that more and more employment will be in the service industry. In two countries, manufacturing industry's share of employment is not 23 per cent., as it is in Scotland, but 29 or 30 per cent. They are not Third world or backward countries; they are Japan and West Germany, which have more jobs in manufacturing industry than we have in Scotland.

We must accept that much of the apparent movement from manufacturing to the service industries is illusory. Jobs that used to be done in-house in manufacturing industry are now being done out of house in the service industries—in banking, marketing and so on. There has been a transfer of jobs from inside jobs to outside firms.

We must realise that manufacturing industry will not play a declining role in future. At the very least its role will remain as it is and it is likely to increase. Service industries' overwhelming purpose is to serve the needs of manufacturing industry. The Government's lack of interest in the needs of Scotland and manufacturing industry—quite apart from the immorality of their taxation policies—is the fundamental weakness of their Budget.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the debate be now adjourned.—[Mr. Kenneth Clarke.]

Rover Group

7.5 pm

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I think it will be for the convenience of the House if I make a statement about the Rover Group.

Yesterday I informed the House that the European Commission had decided the outline terms governing the state aid for the proposed British Aerospace acquisition of the Government's shareholding in Rover Group. I also explained that BAe had asked for more time to consider the implications of other conditions attached to the Commission's decision.

I should make it clear that the points of difficulty for BAe were not related to the basic financial framework of the deal, which was acceptable in principle to BAe and which has not changed since yesterday. The issue was the commercial flexibility available to BAe in complying with the Commission's decision.

I am, however, glad to report that talks with the Commission this morning have clarified the position in terms satisfactory to the BAe board.

As I informed the House yesterday, the Commission has approved the final terms of the acquisition after certain changes in the structure and scale of the March agreement. In making this judgment, the Commission has recognised the important implications for competition and restructuring in the European vehicles market through the return of Rover Group to the private sector. It has also taken note of the prospects for the development of the company, on the basis of Rover Group's management's plans which BAe has endorsed.

Under the revised arrangements it has been agreed that some residual items of trading debt should remain on the balance sheet. The revised terms also take account of the continuing improvement in Rover Group's financial performance since the talks with BAe were launched. I am sure that the House will have welcomed the improvement in the half-year results that Rover Group announced yesterday. These showed a profit before interest of £28·8 million compared with a loss of £10 million for the same period last year.

On this basis, BAe will still pay £150 million for the Government's shareholding in Rover Group. The precise timing of the payment will follow the clarification of certain tax matters arising out of the change of ownership of the company. The Government, BAe and the Commission have also agreed a new cash injection of £547 million comprising £469 million in recognition of historic debt; and £78 million to support part of Rover Group's investment programme in the assisted areas.

In addition, we have agreed material changes to the tax provisions of the March agreement. There has been no change in the provision that only £500 million of Rover's existing trading losses will be available after it has been acquired by British Aerospace, but we have agreed to remove two other tax restrictions that were in the earlier agreement. They will give the British Aerospace group the same freedom that any other company has under tax law to utilise about £200 million of Rover Group's capital losses and up to about £300 million of disclaimed capital allowances. Estimating the value of those tax benefits is a matter for British Aerospace, although clearly they are very significant.

I pay tribute to the contribution made by Graham Day, his management team and his work force, whose skills and hard work have permitted the return of 18 Rover Group businesses to private ownership since May 1986. They have raised the performance of Rover Group to the point where it can now look forward with confidence at its final return to the disciplines of the market place, as part of one of Europe's major engineering groups.

I am certain that the Rover Group's return to the private sector will prove to be in the best interests of the company, its employees and dealers—as well as of the many thousands of others in its supplying industries whose livelihoods depend upon the Rover Group's health. The deal also means that, subject only to approval at an extraordinary general meeting of British Aerospace, we shall have returned to the private sector the last of the constituent parts of what was British Leyland.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): Is it not clear that Ministers have spent the last 27 hours trying not so much to safeguard the British car industry as to salvage what they can from the mess they have created? Is it not equally clear that they have failed miserably in that attempt? Have Ministers so far conceded control over their own policy that to overcome a problem that the Chancellor of the Duchy himself described only yesterday as not being "especially important or material" they have had to return cap in hand to Brussels to beg for concessions?

Is it not a further humiliation that the response to that request was to send Ministers packing with a flea in their ear? Will the Chancellor of the Duchy confirm the Commission's statement today that it has not changed its position in any way?

How is it that an unelected official can tell the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that his terms are non-negotiable? How is it that the Commission can dictate to the British Government on the details of Rover's corporate plan when the House of Commons is kept in the dark? Does that new corporate plan mean, at the EEC's behest, the virtual end of British-controlled car manufacture? What was the point at issue that was supposedly trivial but which caused so much concern to British Aerospace and which was so non-negotiable for the Commission?

How is it that British Aerospace has now accepted £250 million less than Ministers initially offered? As I asked yesterday, why was it left to the EEC to negotiate that reduction in the spending of taxpayers' money? What reliance can be placed on a deal in which British Aerospace manifestly has so little confidence, and which manifestly carries with it so little commitment to the British car industry? If it has taken Professor Roland Smith 27 hours to have his arm twisted, how long will it take him to persuade his institutional shareholders to accept the deal? Is it true that institutional shareholders have already been telephoning to express their objections?

May we be given a guarantee that, if the shareholders throw out the deal, there will be no hawking round of Rover to any buyer—whether British or, more likely, foreign—who can be found, and that we will have no more of these embarrassing nonsenses in the name of an unnecessary and unwelcome privatisation?

Mr. Clarke: I appreciate that the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) has had to guess to a certain extent about the way in which my right hon. and noble Friend and myself have spent the last 27 hours. Having heard his opening questions, I may say that his guesswork is miles wide of the truth. Over the past 27 hours, we have been clarifying certain of the procedural conditions which the Commission attached to its decision and which were communicated to British Aerospace yesterday morning. The Commission has not changed the nature of its agreement with either the Government or British Aerospace: nobody asked it to do so. As I said yesterday, the British Government were agreed, and we did not return to the Commission asking for any change.

British Aerospace, quite rightly, wished to go over the terms and written conditions it received yesterday and to clarify certain points. In particular, British Aerospace wished to reassure itself that it would retain commercial flexibility in the management of its business. I am glad to say that, as a result of the exchanges between the Commission and British Aerospace, in which the Government played a helpful part, BAe is now satisfied, from the explanations it has received, that it will have the necessary commercial freedom that any responsible management would want in running a business.

That is what caused what I described yesterday—as it has turned out, accurately—as a "last-minute hitch". It did not grow, it has been removed, and with clarification we can now proceed.

Rover Group's management plans have not been changed at any stage in that process. They were not changed by the Commission, and they were not changed by British Aerospace. They have been accepted by British Aerospace. Of course we have not disclosed those plans to the House. We have not disclosed them publicly because there must be commercial confidentiality about the management plans of a business of that kind. To disclose Rover Group's corporate and management plans would be of huge advantage to its foreign and domestic competitors. It would have been quite wrong to reveal them. It was wrong to do so when the group was nationalised, and it would be wrong to do so now that it is to be privatised.

As to changes in the deal, the deal must be looked at as a whole. As I said, its scale and structure have been changed. It is true that the cash injection has been reduced by about £250 million. At the same time, there have been changes made to the tax losses available to British Aerospace. On the other hand, we have removed the ring fencing from the capital losses and the unclaimed capital allowances, so that they can now be used against the business of British Aerospace as a whole. Therefore, the agreement structure has been changed.

Certain factors have mainly influenced that change, apart from the Commission's perfectly legitimate desire to ensure that state aids were not being given to Rover Group on a basis that gave it an unfair competitive advantage over its competitors, which is a policy we support. Inevitably, we entered into discussions with the Commission knowing that it was likely to make changes. It has always done so in the past. It did so in the case of Leyland-DAF last year and in respect of Renault earlier this year. Also—this should be very welcome—Rover Group's own performance and our expectations of the debt at the date of completion were changing as our discussions proceeded, and we have just had its excellent results.

I believe that the agreement is certainly one that we can endorse. It is extremely welcome. The hon. Member for

[Mr. Clarke]

Dagenham spoke about what the shareholders may decide at the extraordinary general meeting. That is the next and last step, but the British Aerospace board will commend the agreement to the company's shareholders, and my guess is that the shareholders will take more notice of the British Aerospace board than they will of the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends, who have merely been trying to wreck this whole arrangement from the moment that it started.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that this is an interruption of a very important debate. I ask for single questions.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that this excellent news is the result of the Government's good stewardship in looking after Rover Group during the past few years, and of the high standard of the group's present management? The House, if it is sensible, ought to welcome the group's move back into the private sector, particularly into a firm such as British Aerospace, with its wide spread of engineering and high-tech skills. The Rover Group has a real chance of prospering and of doing better and better, as we surely all hope it will do.

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend. He is right to congratulate the group's management. This is almost a historic occasion. My hon. Friend and I have been Members of the House for the same period. It is an amazing thought that we are on the threshold of seeing Rover Group ceasing to be a politicised company and returning to an ordinary commercial basis, and to having a management planning for its future free from the constraints of the public sector and of vast losses. It is a significant landmark in the recovery of the British economy. It is most symbolic of the way in which the British economy generally is reviving.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): In view of this amazing episode, will the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster tell us who is running the country and whether the British Government have any say in it? Is he aware that it looks at though Commissioner Sutherland has much more influence over these matters than he does as a Minister of the Crown? Who elected Commissioner Sutherland, and by what democratic method can we remove him? Are we to assume that the next time the Minister stands at the Dispatch Box to give a statement on British Government industrial policy he will have to say, "But of course, as we are just a county council in the Common Market, this all depends on whether I am overruled by my superiors in Brussels"?

Mr. Clarke: The policy of the European Community is that state aids, to use the European phrase—in other words, subsidies to industry—should be regulated to ensure that member Governments do not start subsidising against each other to preserve loss-making industries and excess capacity. That is not in the long-term interests of the European Community and its economy. The British Government wholly support that aim.

I believe that it is desirable to have a market within the European Community in which the Governments do not subsidise their respective client companies against one another. Where a degree of state aid is justified, it is right that someone should police it. That is what has happened on this occasion. The British Government not only accept that policy, but we do not have any difficulties with the Commission about it, as the satisfactory resolution of this issue has demonstrated.

If we ever, heaven save us, have a Labour Government again, I am glad to say that the policy of the Community would stop them returning to a system of indiscriminate state subsidies to nationalised industries and propping up the fantastic losses that Rover Group began to incur in the days of bad stewardship in the 1970s.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that, despite the Opposition's carping attitude, there will be few people in the country who will not heartily welcome the satisfactory outcome of the negotiations? Few people will not join in wishing all possible success to everyone involved—the management and work force of Rover and British Aerospace—and will not thoroughly condemn the stupid, frivolous, irresponsible and superficial attitude of the Opposition Front Bench.

Mr. Clarke: I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend's description of the Opposition as "carping". There have been moments in the confused history of the Opposition's approach to this matter when they brought temporary cheer to those with the interests of Fiat, Volkswagen, Renault and other car companies in mind. I am sure that they have, unintentionally, given considerable encouragement to Rover's rivals. A successful deal is a much better outcome for our company.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Can the Minister give watertight assurances to the House that British Aerospace has accepted and will implement Rover's investment programme? What guarantees and assurances did he seek on future employment within Rover and what were given?

Mr. Clarke: As I said in my statement, British Aerospace has accepted and endorsed Rover's management plans. In common with every other management, British Aerospace retains the right to be flexible in applying those plans, as it must. That was the point that we were discussing. British Aerospace sought clarification to ensure that it was free to respond to market conditions and that it has the same flexibility that any management requires as things evolve. As of now, British Aerospace accepts and endorses the management plan of Rover Group, and when it acquires the business it will proceed on that basis.

Sir Hal Miller (Bromsgrove): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that all this kerfuffle over the dashing, once again, of the Opposition's hopes that the deal would fail should not be allowed to obscure the fact that, with improved quality and improved management, and given the tremendous manufacturing cost advantage and the success of this Government's policies, Britain is once more the place to make cars? That is why the deal will succeed.

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend; and I am sure that he agrees with me that the last hopes of the Opposition were dashed by the good results of the past six months. The Opposition would have got the position that they would have preferred only if Rover had plunged back into loss and the deal had been frustrated.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Given the two new tax breaks, can the Minister estimate just how much British Aerospace will be given to take on the Rover Group? Will Rover Group have to pay the Government £150 million, or will the Government deduct that from the money that they will give to British Aerospace?

Mr. Clarke: The tax losses and the unclaimed tax allowances are of value to British Aerospace, but, as I have already said, only the company can calculate that and it can do so only when it has made progress in assessing the capital gains that it will use against the capital losses and it has got the necessary clearance from the Inland Revenue for the tax arrangements that it proposes. Once that has been sorted out, the company will pay £150 million in consideration of the Government's shareholding.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): Although I appreciate that Mr. Sutherland was doing the job for which he is empowered, does my right hon. and learned Friend consider that the time has come to decide whether the fact that the commissioners have such power should be brought to the attention of the Council of Ministers?

As we move towards 1992 we must ensure that the restructuring that industry in Europe believes is necessary is carried out more efficiently than it has been in the past several months. Does not my right hon. Friend find it amazing that, given all the union support, no Opposition Members support the proposal?

Mr. Clarke: I frequently encounter Commissioner Sutherland at Council of Ministers meetings and, among other things, we discuss state aids. There is no difference between Commissioner Sutherland and myself about those aids. At the moment I have joined with other Ministers to encourage Mr. Sutherland to take a careful look at the Italian proposals for state aids to their steel industry. We support the commissioner in his declared intention to take a firm view of that matter and to ensure that the Italians comply with the rules.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Despite what the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren) has just said, does the Minister agree that Commissioner Sutherland was acting entirely within the rules and entirely within the constraints of the treaty of Rome? Surely his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) demonstrates that, in this respect and in many others, a future House of Commons and a future Labour Government would be politically constrained by that treaty. If, as the Minister has claimed, the Government were aware of the constraints, why did they not produce a deal that could have got through the loops instead of being caught on the barbed wire?

Mr. Clarke: Unlike the hon. Gentleman, I am a supporter of Britain's membership of the European Community and a supporter of the economic regime within the Community. I have already said that I am a supporter of the policy of state aids which the Commissioner has applied. I should have thought that the whole point of my statement today was to make it clear that my right hon. and noble Friend has conducted negotiations with the result that we have got through the loops and have complied with Community policy to reach a conclusion that is wholly satisfactory to the Commission, to the British Government and to the board of British Aerospace.

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle): Apart from the commercial flexibility considerations to which my right hon. and learned Friend has alluded, should not any responsible board of directors who have put their name to an offer document and then had the terms of that document revised sit down and work out the profit and cash flow implications of the changes? Is that not the very least that their shareholders and employees would expect of them?

Mr. Clarke: British Aerospace has done that throughout its contemplation of and discussions about the purchase of the Rover Group. It was happy with the financial agreement which emerged and which my right hon. and noble Friend had been discussing with it while discussing the agreement with the Commission.

Yesterday, British Aerospace got written terms from the Commission setting out the procedures that the Commission would follow, but British Aerospace wanted more time to consider them and to receive certain clarifications. It has now got those clarifications and it is going ahead. British Aerospace has told us that it will now commend the deal for its commercial and financial common sense to its shareholders at the extraordinary general meeting.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): Was the European Commission right when it referred in its statement yesterday to "The planned move by Rover from mass car producer to specialist producer"?

If it was, is such a move a matter for celebration by the Conservative party? What employment problems are likely to arise from such a move? What are the implications of it for those in the west midlands engaged in the car accessory business who depend upon the Rover Group for their future survival?

Mr. Clarke: There is a certain amount of semantics involved in this, but Mr. Graham Day has said publicly on a number of occasions that Rover Group is not a volume car producer—[HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"]—because it represents 3 per cent. of the European car market. Rover's existing management plans have throughout been accepted by British Aerospace and endorsed. That is the basis on which we are starting.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Surely it should not surprise anyone that the party whose mega-merger industrial policy created the lumbering British Leyland giant in the first place, whose economic policies riddled it with inflation and whose labour policies crippled it with strikes should look so glum today and fall back on its anti-EEC instincts in compensation for the fact that this deal will go through?

Mr. Clarke: I shall not seek to rival my hon. Friend's language, but I wholly agree with his sentiments.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): Will the Minister confirm his astounding statement in reply to the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) that the Government do not know the valuation to be put on the new tax allowances which will be worked out only later by the company? Is it not astounding for the Minister to tell the House that he does not know how much extra taxpayers' money has been ploughed into the deal? Can he tell us the difference between a £250 million subsidy and a £250 million tax allowance? If he can, I promise that nobody on this side of the House will tell the EEC.

Mr. Clarke: We know what is available to Rover Group by way of tax losses which it can use. The trading losses of £500 million remain unchanged and we have capped those. Rover has more trading losses on its books now, and they will be available for use against future Rover Group profits. In the March agreement, the capital losses and unclaimed capital allowances were ring-fenced and could be used only against capital gains in the Rover business. We have removed that ring fence so that they can now be used in British Aerospace as a whole, as lawfully as for any other company. [Interruption.] With respect to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), who disputes that, it is entirely lawful to do that with capital losses and unclaimed capital allowances. Exactly how much use British Aerospace can make of that will depend on its decisions about capital gains and tax computations. It will need section 768 clearance from the Inland Revenue and then it will know the value and will pay the consideration for the share.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): We all want to see the Rover Group succeed in or out of British Aerospace. Given how crucial to that success the corporate plan and the restructuring to which the Minister referred are, is he not hiding behind his claim of commercial confidentiality? Could he not at least tell us whether it is intended that the numbers employed will increase or decrease? Can he tell us whether part of the Cowley site, as has been widely reported, is scheduled to be sold under the plan? Is it not wholly unacceptable that the workers and communities most affected are being kept in the dark about precisely what this means for jobs and the viability of the industry?

Mr. Clarke: This is an old issue and I am sure that this exchange has taken place in the House many times before. The Government do not disclose the corporate plan or the management plans of the Rover Group because they are commercial and are valuable to competitors. I believe that the House has accepted that and, if not, it should. There is no more reason to disclose the management plans to competitors now than there was when it was a nationalised corporation. I understand the hon. Gentleman's concerns about these matters, which are legitimately shared by many of his constituents. I believe that his constituents and the unions that represent them welcome this deal.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that tonight he and our right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State will be the toast of thousands of working people within the Rover Group factories in Birmingham, Solihull and Coventry who look forward to working with British Aerospace to provide the wealth and fill the jobs, which are increasing month by month and will provide them with a high and successful standard of living? I am sure that they extend their thanks.

Mr. Clarke: We do not normally have toasts on the Floor of the House, but I shall propose one in return to the management and work force of the Rover Group who have done so much to get us to where we are today.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Is the Minister aware that his statement—I notice from a copy that it was the third draft—will not bring any joy to British Aerospace workers or to car workers in the midlands? When he spoke of Rover following the other 18 privatised former Leyland businesses, is he aware that not only have Coventry Climax, Self-Changing Gears and Alvis savagely reduced jobs, but that last week the jewel in his crown, Jaguar, froze all recruitment and started cutting jobs through what it euphemistically calls "natural wastage" because of the decline in the American market and currency changes, both of which I warned the Minister about in the House before?

Will the Chancellor answer the question about yesterday's press release from Commissioner Sutherland's office which speaks of the danger of over-capacity in car production in Europe and states:

> "The planned move by Rover from mass car producer to specialist producer will reduce the danger of aid being used to expand capacity"?

Does not that mean that the sword of Damocles will hang over the jobs at Longbridge, about which Uriah Heep has just spoken, and those at Cowley, about which my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) spoke?

Mr. Clarke: The commissioner was anxious to ensure that none of the 12 Governments used subsidies to expand capacity at a time when, in his judgment, there was surplus capacity. The hon. Gentleman talks about employment in various companies. Employment in manufacturing, as in the service industries, depends on success in the market place and on making products which can sell. That is the case for all the companies that he cited, and it will continue to be the case for British Aerospace, Rover Group and other great firms. The Government's approach to these matters has been hugely successful in creating employment, as this morning's unemployment figures have again confirmed. The hon. Gentleman is wrong in believing that the Government can fix the numbers of people employed in particular plants making particular products. That is an absurd approach to industrial policy.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that, when the all-party Select Committee on Trade and Industry looked at the initial nationalisation of British Leyland, the problems of the Rootes Group, the Chrysler rescue operation and others, it always regarded the corporate plan of the companies as essentially commercially confidential and that it would have destroyed the future that the Committee was trying to preserve had they been revealed? Will he stress that the taxation arrangements that he announced today are not making extra deviations from normal tax law, but bringing the provisions more nearly into parallel with normal tax law?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is a senior and experienced Member and I am grateful to him for endorsing my belief about the confidentiality of corporate plans. I do not believe that any Select Committee would ever wish to expose those to the public eye. They never have and never will. Rover Group has suffered greatly from being drawn into the political arena, but fortunately it has never suffered the blow of seeing its management plans trailed over the Floor of the House of Commons, and I trust that it never will.

My hon. Friend is right that in March we put a ring fence around the capital losses and allowances so that ordinary law did not apply and British Aerospace could not have used them in its business as a whole. We have removed that ring fence so that the ordinary law applies to this new group on the capital tax position, just as it would for any other acquisition.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are in the middle of an important debate. I shall allow questions to continue until a quarter to eight and then we must move on.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): Has it not taken the Commission to expose the Government's golden give-away terms, not only in this but in every privatisation, and their fly-boy attitude to public investment? Has it not taken the Commission also to expose the Government's lack of willingness to take on board competition policy in reality and to approach both privatisation issues and industry in general with a determination to serve the public's best interests rather than investors?

Mr. Clarke: We had all this yesterday. I have explained the basis upon which the discussions went on and how the agreement that we have arrived at was reached. If I follow the hon. Gentleman, I take it that he supports the Commission's terms and the agreement that we have entered into. So do I, so do the Government, so does British Aerospace—so there should be nothing between us.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is astonishingly naive of the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and some of his hon. Friends not to realise that it would be inconceivable that a major and complex corporate deal of this kind could be put together without a great deal of delicate and cliff-hanging negotiation? Does he agree that their attitude to these matters reflects their most profound inexperience? Does he accept that there will be widespread admiration, not only in the two companies concerned but throughout British industry, for the able way in which he and the Secretary of State have conducted the negotiations on behalf of the Government, and that an expanding and thriving British Aerospace will be a fine monument to their achievements in the future?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend to the extent that I hope that Opposition Members will go over the agreement and how we reached it, so that in the unlikely event of any of them having to deal with the European Commission in matters of this sort they will have a slightly better understanding of how these affairs are conducted than they did in March or yesterday.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Minister aware that it would strike someone outside this place that what has happened in the course of these 24 hours was that he has been unable to convince people in the Common Market about the straight subsidy? The Common Market almost certainly then told him to cover it up and get in touch with chartered accountants, who would fiddle the tax and provide the same sort of money in that way. Why cannot that be done for taxpayers in Britain so that they can have the ring fence removed from around them and set up tax liabilities against other assets? Is it not significant that this matter is being discussed on the day of the Third Reading of the Finance (No. 2) Bill, when £2 billion is being handed out to top taxpayers—and here the Minister comes along with another big tax fiddle?

Mr. Clarke: I have already explained this. As I said yesterday, we were in complete agreement with the commissioner. The Government did not go back to the Commission and ask to have any of the terms changed. For the Government and the Commission, nothing has changed since yesterday morning. Quite correctly, British Aerospace wanted clarification of a text that it saw only yesterday morning about the procedures and conditions that the Commission was applying. In discussions on that, the Government played an intermediary role. The board is now satisfied, and that is where we are now.

I have tried with some care to explain the tax position. It bears no relation to what the hon. Gentleman said. The company is being governed by the same law and tax rules as apply to any other private company in this country.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his statement. Is he as surprised as I am that, although he has announced a successful conclusion, the Opposition are giving it exactly the same response as if he had succeeded in finding a failure for them? Surely the Opposition realise that competition policy has existed for years. It has been criticised because other countries have not obeyed the rules, as we do. I hope that, in future, subsidies for all nations that belong to the European Parliament will be scrutinised in the Council of Ministers and subjected to the same media exposure as this case has been.

Mr. Clarke: As a Member of the European Parliament and of the House, my hon. Friend has always supported competition policy, and we have consistently taken this view about subsidies in the EEC over the years. We are, as I said yesterday, equally firm in insisting that the Commission applies the same agreed regime to other countries. We are usually amongst the most vehement in requesting the Commission to uphold its duty and make sure that others apply only legitimate state aids to business.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The Minister will not have had time to bring himself up to date yet with the Bathgate position, as he promised to do yesterday, but will he say something about the £78 million, which is to "support part of Rover Group's investment programme in the assisted areas"?

How is the sum of £469 million of historic debt arrived at?

Mr. Clarke: The £78 million is regional selective assistance given on the same criteria as we always apply to regional selective assistance for any other company. The assistance goes towards some of the investment plans of the Rover Group under its management plans. It will help to support and maintain jobs in the west midlands that now have assisted-area status.

Mr. Dalyell: What about Bathgate?

Mr. Clarke: To the best of my knowledge and belief, it has nothing to do with Bathgate. I will write to the hon.

[Mr. Clarke]

Gentleman if there is any mistake about that. It is regional selective assistance for investment in the continuing business of Rover Group.

As for debt, we have agreed to allow the historic trading debts to be removed from the books of the company, except that £100 million-worth of historic debt is now to remain on the books. That has led to a change in the deal since we announced it in March. Apart from that, a vehicle stock provision was made in the books of the company which we previously regarded as debt, but the Commission regards as working capital, so it has been taken out of the original March agreement. There have been other minor changes, but those two were the big ones—£100 million historic debt remaining on the books, and vehicle stock provision, which is no longer to be written off by the Government.

Mr. Robert Hayward (Kingswood): My right hon. and learned Friend has removed a large element of uncertainty hanging over British Aerospace and Rover Group. Can he reconfirm that these negotiations have in no way affected any negotiations between the Government and British Aerospace on the Airbus programme?

Mr. Clarke: I can. Our arrangements in the Department of Trade and Industry have helped with that. My right hon. and noble Friend conducts all day-to-day business on the Rover Group and I conduct all day-to-day business on Airbus.

I hate to use the expression "Chinese walls", but there are certain Chinese walls between the discussions, and my right hon. and noble Friend and I regularly discuss the position on both fronts. One thing that has emerged all the way through is that there is no connection between this arrangement for Rover Group and the launch aid that the Government have given to Airbus, on which our position is given and perfectly clear.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the Minister confirm that this rather shabby conspiracy has resulted in £2·9 billion-worth of taxpayers' money going to British Aerospace—plus £1 billion in cash and capital allowances? Does he agree that British Aerospace will receive in return £750 million-worth of physical assets for £150 million? Would not most people regard that as barefaced robbery of the taxpayer? Why cannot the taxpayer be given the benefit of this developing company, whose results the Minister has mentioned? Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman accept that there will be enormous pressure from the workers and the labour movement to get this company back into public ownership, where it belongs?

Mr. Clarke: What the hon. Gentleman describes as a conspiracy is an agreement to return Rover Group to the private sector where it belongs and where, in our opinion, it will flourish. It is a wholly suitable end to our exchanges tonight, if this be the end of them, that a Labour Member should sound as thought he is urging his hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench to renationalise the company——

Mr. Cryer: Yes, I am.

Mr. Clarke: Looking back over the history of the nationalised British Leyland, which has cost the British taxpayer £2·9 billion, I am astonished to see the unreconstructed end of the Labour party still demanding its renationalisation. What I have announced today promises a very much better future for the company, its work force, its dealers and everyone associated with it.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Finance (No. 2) Bill

Question again proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

7.48 pm

Ms. Joyce Quin (Gateshead): Throughout our debates on the Budget and on the Finance Bill—including the Committee stage—the Government and their supporters have steadfastly refused to accept the truth of their Budget measures: that they represent huge benefits for the rich and create an almost unbridgeable chasm between rich and poor.

In Committee, Conservative Members claimed that only Labour had criticised the Budget for its handouts to the very rich. That is absolute nonsense. Let me quote one or two of the headlines that greeted the Budget when it was first presented to the House:

"Dramatic gains for the rich."
"An end to old-fashioned egalitarianism."
"A gain for high earners with little to offset it."

Those are from the Financial Times.

"Super-rich net big bonus from tax changes."
"Low earners lose out from tax reform."

Those are from The Guardian. Virtually throughout our press—which is not normally hostile to the Conservative Government—similar headlines showed us how the Budget was received.

Organisations concerned with the plight of the poorest sections of the country—organisations such as Shelter, Age Concern, the Low Pay Unit and many charities and welfare organisations—expressed their utter dismay at what the Budget contained.

In a rather strange speech, the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) enlisted the aid of John Wesley in support of the Budget and the Bill. Apart from thinking that it is a dubious practice to try to enlist the aid of someone who has been dead for a great many years and to quote him as being in favour of a particular Bill or clause when he is not in a position to make his views known, I believe that what the hon. Gentleman said was far from being the view of most Methodists and most Church people in today's society. It was foolish of him to single out a particular cleric when it was clear from the recent Methodist conference that the views of that cleric were supported by nearly all the delegates. A motion passed virtually unanimously condemned the divisive nature of the Government's economic policies. That was not the view of one person alone; it represented a wide spread of opinion.

We must also recognise that the Methodist Church is in the same camp on these issues as the Church of England, and indeed the Roman Catholics, particularly the Catholic bishops, who made very similar statements. They are taking that view not because they have suddenly become party political or because they all want to join a particular political party, but because they see the reality of Government policies in their parishes and in all parts of the country where they have a presence. It is the reality of the poverty that has been created in the Government's period of office that is giving rise to such widespread sentiments of concern.

Some elements of the business community have also criticised the Budget and the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) pointed out in an earlier intervention that the CBI in the northern region had tremendous misgivings about the Budget because of the regional effect of the measures, which, it was felt -particularly in view of the extension of the business expansion scheme to private housing—would benefit the south-east more than the north-east. Moreover, the top earners tend to be concentrated in the south-east, and it was therefore felt that the money coming from tax cuts would circulate in the already prosperous parts of the country rather than in the areas that most need a cash injection.

Several myths have appeared during our discussions in Committee and on the Floor of the House. One is the myth of the low-tax society that the Government claim to be creating. With the shift towards indirect taxation, many people find that they are paying more in tax overall, although the richest are paying up to 40 per cent. less. The head of the Low Pay Unit calculated that today's super-taxpayers were the poor rather than the rich, given the way in which the Budget measures and the allied social security measures have combined.

An article in the Financial Times of 4 May contrasts the circumstances of two similar couples:

"Income tax and national insurance for a married couple on 10 times the average earnings and with a part-time working spouse and no children counted for 61·1 per cent. of earnings in 1978-79, compared with 36·9 per cent. in the current financial year. For the same type of household on half the average earnings, the tax burden this year will be higher than in 1979."

That is a disgraceful situation. It is figures like that that the Government cannot avoid when they try to soft-soap us into believing that everyone has benefited substantially from the Budget. My hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) was told in answer to a question that more than 7·5 million households were worse off under the Budget measures and the social security changes combined.

Another myth, propounded yet again by the Chief Secretary this evening, is that the Budget is a Budget for incentives. The only incentive created in this Budget is the incentive to import. The cuts in income tax and the lack of investment in manufacturing industry mean that the likely gainers from the tax cuts will be those producing goods in other countries which will be imported into Britain in ever-increasing numbers. As we know, the recent trade figures bear that out. This is a fear that we have expressed throughout our debates—a fear that we have expressed for a long time, given the Government's economic strategy —and it certainly seems to accord with the present reality.

Looking at our present tax system, we must face many unpleasant facts. It is still possible for someone earning £1 million to pay no tax. The top 1 per cent. will pay £4·7 billion—in other words, an average of £22,680 per taxpayer less this year than under the Labour Government. Yet, at the same time as the rich have received these enormous benefits, pensioners, because of the broken link between pensions, wages and prices, are earning less than they would have been if the link had been maintained. The pensioner married couple would now be earning about £79 instead of £69. Many people have seen their standard of living plummet, as I know from my constituency and from parts of Tyneside where poverty has become visible in a way that it was not 10 years ago.

The Chief Secretary has made great play tonight of the improvement in employment figures. We must realise, however, that under the present Government unemployment was at a record level, and that any improvement that there has been represents an improvement of a dire position. Unemployment is still far higher than when Labour was in office. The Chief Secretary's claims struck a very hollow note with me, because this week in my constituency we have faced the loss of 450 highly qualified technological jobs in Marconi Radar, which has more than wiped out any meagre employment gains in Gateshead in recent months.

I want to make that point very loudly. Conservative Members simply do not realise that substantial redundancies are still taking place in the manufacturing sector—redundancies which, in an area such as the north-east, we can ill afford. These are real jobs, which it will be extremely difficult to replace in anything approaching the near future.

The effects of the Government's measures on the economy as a whole, as well as on specific regions, are also very worrying. The balance of payments has deteriorated dramatically. Some measures have promoted rapid growth in credit, on which we had a good debate yesterday when many valid points were made. The investment that we need for our country and for the future is still in very short supply. Investment is still below the levels of the last Labour Government. It is not just Opposition Members who say that. Organisations such as the Institution of Civil Engineers and British Aggregate Construction Materials Industries consistently claim in evidence to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee that public capital investment is the poor relation in the Government's economic strategy.

The right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) said that Budgets often look different after 24 hours. The judgment on this Budget was harsh as soon as it was announced, but the judgment should be even harsher now, particularly from those who have had the opportunity of scrutinising its grisly details throughout the long sittings in Committee. It is a disgraceful Bill, and the blatant way in which the wealthy have been showered with benefits shows a deep contempt for society as a whole.

8.1 pm

Mr. James Arbuthnot (Wanstead and Woodford): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) because, however much one may disagree with what she says, she always puts it with a care and persuasiveness that I find rather enviable.

This year, there is one Finance Bill; last year, there were two Finance Bills. What this year lacks in quantity, it makes up for in quality. Last year, with some diffidence, I made my maiden speech on the Third Reading of the second Finance Bill on 20 July.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Gedling): It was a very good one.

Mr. Arbuthnot: In that speech I asked for three changes to be considered; first, a change in the taxation of married women, which I regarded as an archaic and insulting antique; secondly, a change in capital gains tax legislation, which was absurdly complicated; and, thirdly, a change in the way in which our tax system relates—or rather, does not—to our benefits system. I am delighted to say that, within less than a year, the Government have changed the taxation of women, they have dealt partly with the taxation of capital gains, and I am sure that they will shortly begin to consider changing the way in which the tax system relates to the benefits system.

The change in married women's taxation is one of the most historic changes of this century, because it begins to treat women as equals. The Government have brought in equality of treatment for women, yet at every step of the way they have been vigorously opposed by Opposition Members, who talk about equality for women, but whenever the scent of equality for women is within their nostrils they run a mile. I am therefore truly grateful to the Government for the change in the taxation of women.

The Government have made a start on the taxation of capital gains. I describe it only as a start, but it is a major start, as it brings the taxation of capital gains closer to the taxation of income by virtually amalgamating the two, although there is still plenty of work to be done. There is much legislation which is now unnecessary, or could at least be simplified, which discourages people from converting capital gains into income, or income into capital gains, to reduce their tax rates. That could perhaps be achieved by abolishing capital gains tax altogether and introducing a new schedule to the Income Tax Acts so that capital gains could be taxed under schedule F. That would necessitate suitable changes to the allowances, and the indexation allowance, which I regard as too complicated to be worth while, might have to be abolished. However, if the Government are serious about abolishing inflation, as I am sure they are, the indexation allowance should become less and less important.

The issue of national insurance is related to the tax and benefit systems and needs consideration. Before the Budget there were rumours that if my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer reduced the higher rates of income tax he would claw back that relief from higher rate taxpayers by increasing the national insurance rates that they would pay. I am delighted that he did not do that, mainly because national insurance is such an abomination. I should like to see it abolished altogether. It is the equivalent of another income tax, but it requires its own bureaucracy. It has the most curious marginal rates of tax, which are sometimes over 100 per cent. It is a con for people who contribute towards their pensions. They contribute towards their pensions in the belief that they are building up a pension fund for themselves in future, when we know that national insurance contributions are spent on today's pensions. If anyone other than the Government tried that sort of thing he would be arrested, and quite rightly too. National insurance no longer has any place in our taxation system. It should be amalgamated with the income tax system, and we would not lose by doing that.

National insurance brings in about £28 billion a year, so it would be the act of a brave man to say that it would cost nothing to abolish it. The Budget is based on the idea that if we reduce taxation we encourage incentives, we encourage people not to go abroad, we encourage tax exiles abroad to come home and we encourage employment prospects. If we reduce taxation, we can increase the tax take. It would cost far less than £28 billion to abolish national insurance. That is not considered in this year's Finance Bill and will probably not be considered in the next year's Bill, and possibly not even in the following year's Bill, but at some time I should like the Government to consider not only the possibility of reducing income tax to 20 per cent., but also the possibility of abolishing national insurance.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): When the Government announced the Budget, they boasted—that is something that they are rather good at—that it was the most generous Budget this century. Few people believed it then—even the Daily Mail and the Daily Express recorded some criticism—and fewer people believe it now. They know that the Government's generosity has been selectively targeted on the rich to an extent unknown in living memory.

It is the rich, not the rest, who make major gains from the capital gains exemptions, who benefit primarily from inheritance tax changes and who enjoy the tax-free gains from the business expansion scheme and other Government tax relief schemes. The poor, and those people on low and modest incomes, saw any tiny gains from the Budget swallowed by gas and electricity prices rises, by rent rises, which were three times the rate of inflation, and by soaring mortgage interest rates.

Many poor people fared even worse than that, including elderly people who have lost housing benefit, handicapped people who have forfeited allowances for heating, laundry and baths, and disabled people who are no longer able to afford diets, let alone home comforts. Those people have viewed the Budget with horror.

My hon. Friends have rightly pointed out many of the inequities that lie within the Budget. There is, however, another element that is a cause for great concern. My constituents and I fear the proliferation of private landlords. People are greatly troubled by the likely effects of the business expansion scheme, details of which are to be found in schedule 4. They are worried that more flats in Marchment will be bought up and let to tenants who have no vested interest in the well-being of the area. They are fearful that unscrupulous methods will be employed to remove current tenants. They are anxious about the Government's failure to impose a social landlords' charter with real safeguards for tenants from landlords who are running establishments that have been set up under the BES.

In Edinburgh and elsewhere we have seen too much use of public money for private landlords. The Conservative-controlled council gave property speculators over £6 million in repair grants. Private property was converted into executive flats for visiting business men. Five years have passed and the flats are still empty. Edinburgh's Labour-controlled council has stopped the grants, but the Government are changing the law and speculative landlords will have a new lease of life. The BES will allow those who enjoy large incomes to offset £15,000 a year or more, and to pay little if any tax on property developments that come within the scheme.

In that way, £40 million of public money this year will go to those investing in housing for rent. Such housing will not be subject to the Rent Acts and there will be no security of tenure for tenants. There will be no obligation on investors to maintain the property for rent at the end of five years. Indeed, there will be an incentive for such investors to get out of it and enjoy capital gains tax exemption from the profit that is made when the property is sold. The BES will give a green light to the Nicholas van Hoogstratens of this world. The Evening Standard tells us that thug factors in property development will enable investors to double their money in five years.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury was forced to concede in Committee that nothing in the Budget and nothing in the BES will stop van Hoogstraten from cashing in on the cash bonanza that the BES will open. This is in spite of his criminal record of evicting young families in winter, harassing senior citizens to obtain vacant possession, cutting off gas, electricity and heating supplies and creating explosions to get rid of sitting tenants. Companies, including those which operate under van Hoogstraten, will receive an open-ended subsidy of £200 million over the lifespan of the scheme.

If the Budget was designed to help the homeless and if it was aimed at providing rented housing for the elderly and the handicapped, that money would have been made available to housing associations and local authorities. Instead, the Government have chosen to target it on the undeserving rich. Instead of putting the £200 million to the provision of 5,000 houses for the elderly, the handicapped, the overcrowded and the homeless, Budget money is going to those who clearly have a much higher priority in the mind of the Government—those who have large incomes and who want to make a killing out of the housing misery of thousands of the poorly housed.

This debate takes place after the general public have seen the impact of the Budget on their pay packets. The majority have seen any benefits offset by rises in living costs as a result of the Government's policy. We stand by all the figures that have been quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), the shadow Chief Secretary to the Treasury. He argued the case against the Budget so powerfully, piled up the evidence so convincingly, damned the Government with their own figures so forcefully and presented his arguments with such effectiveness that, apart from a limp intervention from the Chief Secretary, no Conservative Member dared to rise during his speech to challenge his figures or the crushing logic of the Labour party's argument.

After nine years of Conservative Government, participant after participant in the debate has voiced concern and alarm at the divided Britain that successive Budgets have brought about. We have the divides of north and south and the rich against the rest. The Government have been warned by the Churches, the charities and even by their own supporters, in addition to the Opposition, of the consequences. The Budget continues the corrosive influence that the Government have sought to impose on our society, an influence that will continue for yet another year. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and other Ministers boast that they intend to continue to allow the corrosion to take place and to bring in more measures that will divide Britain to a greater extent than ever before. For these reasons, we reject the logic of this year's Budget and of future Budgets to be introduced by the Government.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Gedling): I do not wish to detain the House overlong, but I do wish to make six brief points. Before I do so, I wish to say how much I enjoyed serving as a member of the Committee that considered the Finance Bill. I found it a worthwhile and interesting experience. Much of the debate in Committee was more constructive than some of the debate to which we have listened tonight. It seemed that there was rather more common ground in Committee than has come across so far this evening.

[Mr. Andrew Mitchell]

For example, there was common ground on the advantages of fiscal neutrality and on the taxation of women. There was plenty of cross-party agreement on the removal of perks. There was even a glimmer of agreement on the heavy price that countries with high taxation regimes are paying for pursuing that policy.

In that contest, I pay my respects to the Opposition Front-Bench team for its handling of the Bill. I am disappointed that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) is not in his place. I have been busy moving house within his constituency today and I look forward to receiving his letter of welcome.

It would be churlish not to mention the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), who enlivened our discussions with his wit and originality—unfortunately, not usually simultaneously. Each and every one of my hon. Friends returned to the Committee with a lighter step after the dinner break when we knew that the hon. Gentleman would be filling the post-prandial slot.

There is no doubt that we have before us a radical Bill. When we come to examine it in future, it will not be the removal of higher rates of tax that will ensure its longevity and create attention. It will be the integration of taxation of capital and income that will achieve that. That is the road down which we have started to progress, and that will be the hallmark by which the Bill is remembered. It is a key change that will have many beneficial effects. Apart from enhancing the drive towards fiscal neutrality, it will powerfully undermine the avoidance industry. It will ensure that lawyers and accountants do something rather more constructive with their time than working out extremely complicated and ingenious schemes for the very rich. It has the great merit of enhancing simplicity. It dismantles various artificial arrangements dictated by the perception of tax advantage rather than that of an open market view.

The pattern of many past Finance Acts has been to tinker with and change existing arrangements, but the Bill is a major departure from that tradition. Many of the ground rules have been changed. Perhaps that will lead to a couple of years during which highly technical measures will be introduced once the Inland Revenue has had a chance to analyse the effects of the Bill, but I hope that the Government will continue down the path that they have set.

The Budget's approach leads logically to the further integration of the taxation of capital and income and the further elimination of the differences in treatment that now apply. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will bear that closely in mind.

The second main quality of the Budget is the abolition of the higher rate of tax. Despite what Opposition Members have said this evening, that move will be seen in future to be entirely right. We have gone through an era of high taxation regimes throughout the world, and it has now ended. It is interesting to listen to what Ministers of the New Zealand and Australian Governments say when they visit Britain. The New Zealand Minister with responsibilities for trade and his colleague the Finance Minister have visited us, and it is interesting to hear what Socialists who are in power have to say about high taxation.

With the coming of 1992 it will be difficult for any one country in Europe, without massively disadvantaging its industry and commerce, to have a high taxation regime if other countries do not choose such a regime. We can no longer ignore the taxation regimes of other countries in Europe. They have a fundamental effect on whether we can attract industry and business, which is critical to our competitiveness.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): Did the hon. Gentleman see the report in The Guardian on Monday about a study undertaken by Professor David Birch of Massachusetts Institute of Technology of the various states and districts of the United States? He found that those with high tax regimes have fast-growing economies and low unemployment. He explains that by saying that low tax regimes frequently have a lower level of services and infrastructure. I should point out that Professor Birch is not merely an academic passing an opinion, but is an entrepreneur in his own right, having a firm called Cognetics, which now contains information about 12 million businesses across the United States.

Mr. Mitchell: I must confess that I missed that article in The Guardian on Monday. Although I have not seen the evidence that the hon. Gentleman cited—I try to avoid many articles written by American economists because I find them so difficult to understand—it flies in the face of most other economic evidence that is published in our great newspapers regularly.

Mr. Battle: If the hon. Gentleman had been in the Chamber earlier he would have heard some Opposition Members referring to the adviser who is often cited by the Chancellor—Lawrence Lindsey—who suggested that by cutting taxes a greater proportion of income would go to the Government of whatever country adopted that strategy. Answers to questions that we have put to the Government have shown that strategy to be false. By adopting a policy of low taxation, the Government will lose money. However, the hon. Gentleman missed the evidence because he was not in the Chamber when it was presented.

Mr. Mitchell: I was fortunate enough to hear much of the hon. Gentleman's speech. However, I do not accept his interpretation of that evidence. We are now all familiar with the effect of that policy. The hon. Gentleman has misinterpreted the parliamentary answer that he was given and has therefore drawn an erroneous conclusion.

I believe that the lowering of the top rates of tax will mean a tremendous increase in revenue for the future. Many now accept that it is fair to pay a top rate of 40 per cent. I have always believed that it is immoral in a free society for the state to take away more than 50 per cent. of what someone earns, and I continue to hold strongly to that view.

My third point relates to the taxation of women. I think all hon. Members agree that this has been a running sore for years and deeply insulting to women. For years we have been saying that something must be done. Now someone has done something, and all hon. Members should give credit to the Government for producing an economy that is sufficiently strong and productive to pay for such an important and long-overdue concession to women.

However, one of the significant side effects of this measure has not been sufficiently well advertised, and that is the downward effect on taxation paid by old folk and women. There are 900,000 women over 65 who will benefit from that one change in the Budget, and 1·5 million married women of all ages will pay less tax. Nearly all of those—1·2 million—have an income of less than £5,000 a year. There are 160,000 elderly couples who will cease to pay tax altogether, and 130,000 elderly men will qualify for age allowance. Those are substantial spin-offs to the benefit of the least well-off in society that result from this important measure.

My fourth point relates to the simplification of taxation of employees' shares in non-approved schemes. I fully understand the Inland Revenue's anxiety that there used to be room for abuse by employees being remunerated for tax reasons, by converting their income into shares. That was clearly wrong, and clearly an abuse, but with the increasing integration of capital gains tax and income tax, could not more of that anti-avoidance legislation be swept away? I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will look carefully at that next year.

It is important to encourage the spread of employee share ownership. We can now do that within a framework where people pay tax regardless of whether it is on income or capital. I hope that we shall continue such charges, which move us more closely towards a share-owning democracy. Anything that encourages employee share ownership, or any other form of share ownership, must be welcome. I was delighted to see in an answer to my question—unfortunately, it was not reached at Question Time today—that, according to the latest Treasury estimates, Britain now has 9 million shareholders—three times as many as in 1979. The Bill simplifies employee share taxation and earns additional praise for that.

Mr. Battle: The hon. Gentleman waxes lyrical on the value of share ownership, but one method of share ownership is co-operative share ownership in the co-operative movement. Only yesterday on Report the Opposition moved an amendment to give relief to co-operatives to enable share ownership ventures to prosper. I wonder why the hon. Gentleman did not support that.

Mr. Mitchell: Not for the first time this evening, the hon. Gentleman is taking what I am saying out of context. I do not intend to be drawn down that path. Instead, let me move to my fifth point, which concerns company residence and migration rules.

As we are major exporters of capital overseas, it is important for the Inland Reveue to be able to tax profit earned overseas, but it is equally important to encourage other countries to operate sensible, pragmatic and liberal tax regimes. We must be careful to maintain a balance, which is why I particularly welcome the changes made on Report.

My final point relates to our discussions in Committee on the business expansion scheme. I was substantially reassured by what my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary had to say on that. However, I hope that he will keep in mind two points for the future. First, in order to encourage those businesses that the Government most want to help, particularly in the manufacturing industry, it may be helpful to review the £500,000 limit next year. Not all manufacturing industries are now started in a garage under an arch. Some require extensive capital and the business expansion scheme may have an important role to play in that, which needs to be continually assessed.

Secondly, the business expansion scheme attracts very favourable tax treatment. One receives a tax break on one's way into the scheme and on the way out through not paying any capital gains tax. This is now a mature scheme and we should look carefully at whether we need that sort of web of tax reliefs to sustain it and ensure that it continues to benefit those parts of the economy that we particularly wish to support.

I want to end by enthusiastically commending the Bill. It addresses the needs of our economy. It is a bold and confident measure and as such it is entirely in keeping with the best traditions of this Government. It deserves the support of the House this evening.

8.27 pm

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): I enjoyed listening to the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell), but I was disappointed with his conclusion. I remember when he contested a constituency near mine. He did not win it, and I hoped that he had learnt something of the problems of a divided country with a divided economy which works in one part of the country but at the expense of other parts. That is essentially what we are trying to address.
